I do not consider the case of Wilcox v. Morrison, 9 Lea, 700, as authority here. It seems clearly distinguishable to my mind. The judgment in Tennessee was against a resident of Tennessee. Wilcox, the judgment creditor, had transferred this judgment to a trustee in Virginia. Afterward Wilcox sought in equity to assert his rights to this Tennessee judgment on the ground that the Virginia debts had been settled, and it was held he could bring before the court the nonresident trustee to whom the judgment had been assigned. This was correct upon the principle that the nonresident trustee would have notice of matters concerning this judgment just as he would be presumed to look after property in Tennessee. His rights under the judgment could only be asserted here, and he was forced to take notice that the court of equity, having power to control this judgment, was asserting this power. It was very much as if he were a party to the judgment sought to be affected, because that judgment had been assigned to him by the plaintiff.

I do not regard the matters affecting this Texas defendant in the present case as coming within that large class of cases which are not strictly actions in rem, but are often spoken of as actions quasi in rem. These actions quasi in rem only seek to subject certain property of the owner to the discharge of the claim asserted, such as attachment cases, actions for the enforcement of mortgages and other liens, and all other proceedings having for their sole object the sale of other disposition of the property of the defendant to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff. They differ, among other things, from actions which are strictly in rem, in that the interest of the defendant is alone sought to be affected so that citation to him is required, and the judgment therein is only conclusive between the parties.

The state has power over property within its limits owned by nonresidents, and it is by virtue of this ownership that tribunals can inquire into the nonresident's obligations to its citizens. The inquiry in such case can only proceed so far as may be necessary for the disposition of the property. If the nonresident possesses no property within the state, there is nothing upon which its tribunals can act. Pennoyer v. Neff and Freeman v. Alderson, supra.

Now in the present case, as I view it, the Texas defendant has no property within this state. She is not a stockholder of the insurance corporation. She has no such interest in the affairs of the corporation as that she will be presumed to take notice of anything respecting the court's action as to the liability of the insurance company.

It is said that the res is before the court in this case. To my mind, no res is here. The claim is not the res. The action is entirely personal. Suit upon the subject matter of this litigation might be brought in any state so far as the insurance company is concerned, where it might be served with process through its proper agents. The Texas defendant might bring her suit involving her rights in any court in any state having such jurisdiction. Furthermore, the property of the insurance company is not before the court, nor involved in the suit. Then, upon what principle must she take notice of a suit against the corporation here in Tennessee? The policy of insurance is like a note. It is not property. It is only the evidence of the obligation. The obligation itself is like a thing in the air which may fly anywhere. The suit is to change or declare a liability of the insurance company personal in its nature. Can it be that a nonresident having an interest in that contract must take notice of the proceeding and appear because the insurance company is before the court? Suppose this action had been brought in any other of the many states where the insurance company, no doubt, does business and has agents; will Mrs. Young, the nonresident having an interest in the obligation of insurance, be forced to take cognizance and appear, upon mere constructive notice? We think not.

It was suggested in argument that under modern insurance the policy holder has a right to share in certain surplus arising from the earnings on money paid in by the policy holder as premiums in excess of the amount necessary to carry the actual risk. If this be so, it is still a personal relationship arising from the contract of insurance, the main feature of which is the insurance, not as an investment or shareholder in the company, but to indemnify the holder against the loss. But, if the policy holder, under modern insurance, has certain rights in the earnings of the company, this suit is not to change or affect the status of policy holders in general upon the principle that they hold a position analogous to stockholders. In point of fact, such policy holders do not stand in such relationship that a suit against the company will authorize the court to deal with them upon the grounds held in Amparo Min. Co. v. Fidelity Trust Co. and Selig v. Hamilton, supra, that, having the corporation before the court, the shares therein are subject to its orders. This is not a suit to change the relationship of the shareholders to the corporation. It is a suit entirely of a personal nature and involving the rights under one policy alone.

The publication has its office, but it does not give actual notice. The party sought to be brought before the court in reality is before the court by the publication, not alone, but in conjunction with the assertion by the court of control over the property or res within its jurisdiction.

Webster defined "due process of law" in his argument in the Dartmouth College Case as "a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial." Within that fundamental right, how can it be said that a court proceeds to hear and give trial when no actual personal notice is given, and when no property of the defendant is affected within the control of the court, which will afford presumptive notice?

The whole proposition reduces to the question of notice. I am unable to see how notice can be had as here attempted, within the rules governing the action of courts exercising power only within a given jurisdiction, within which the defendant does not come. I therefore respectfully dissent from the opinion of the majority on this question, believing the chancellor was correct in sustaining the demurrer of the insurance company.

Buchanan, J., dissenting:

"Jurisdiction has been well defined to be a power constitutionally conferred upon a judge or magistrate to take cognizance of and determine causes according to law and to carry his sentence into execution." Swift & Co. v. Memphis Cold Storage Warehouse Co. 128 Tenn. 82-100, 158 S. W. 480; 11 Cyc. p. 660. The primary question in the present case is whether such power was in the chancery court of Davidson county, in respect of the right of Mrs. Young, which it was the purpose of the bill to have the court adjudicate by its decree. His Honor the chancellor held that, under the facts disclosed by the bill, no such jurisdiction or power existed in his court, and, in my opinion, that holding was correct. The right sought to be affected by the decree was one which existed wholly under contracts referred to in the bill. The first of these was a contract between complainant and the insurance company; the second a contract of assignment between complainant and his mother by which complainant made an assignment, absolute on its face, of all his rights under the insurance contract to his mother. The mother died, and, by operation of law, all her rights under the absolute assignment were cast upon her distributees; Mrs. Young being one of this class. The bill was filed for the purpose of reforming the contract between complainant and his mother in such manner as to wholly defeat the right of Mrs. Young and the other distributees, under the assignment and descent cast, as above stated.

Now the right of Mrs. Young under the foregoing contracts is wholly incorporeal in character. It is a right in property of the same character. Her right is one which inheres in her person. It is attached to no tangible property, and it is capable of being brought into judgment only by personal service of process upon her, affording notice to her that her right is in question, and opportunity to defend the same. It is not pretended that such service of process was had upon her. She was beyond the jurisdiction of the court when the bill was filed, and when the court sustained the demurrer to its jurisdiction. She was at the times aforesaid a resident of the state of Texas. If the case were different in its facts, as, for instance, if the bill had sought to subject, under the decree of the court, a right to real property within the local jurisdiction of the court, or a right to tangible personal property located within the jurisdiction of the court, or other character of property so situated that the court assuming the jurisdiction would be in a position to protect the rights of parties, the court might well have assumed jurisdiction. In such classes of cases the court can lay its hand upon the property, and thereby draw into its jurisdiction the rights of parties attached to the particular property over which the court has assumed jurisdiction. But no such case is presented here. The property right of Mrs. Young is wholly intangible, and is attached to no property which by any proceeding in this cause has or can be brought within the local jurisdiction of the court. Her property right sought to be reached by the decree is inseparable from her person, except by her voluntary surrender of it with or without consideration, her death, or the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction founded on her voluntary appearance or process personally served upon her.

"The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity, and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions. 'Any exertion of authority of this sort beyond this limit' . . . 'is a mere nullity, and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunal.'" Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565.

As I see this suit, it was not a proceeding in rem, nor even one quasi in rem, but was purely a personal action involving only personal and intangible property rights where the jurisdiction of the subject matter of the suit could only be acquired by personal service of process upon the parties in interest. In Pennoyer v. Neff, supra, it was said: "Jurisdiction is acquired in one of two modes: First, as against the person of the defendant by the service of process; or, secondly, by a proceeding against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. In the latter case the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question, and it is immaterial whether the proceeding against the property be by an attachment or bill in chancery. It must be substantially a proceeding in rem."

On the grounds above stated, and those advanced in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Fancher, in which I concur, I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court in this cause.

Annotation—Service by publication to give jurisdiction of issues between nonresident and resident claimants to benefits under an insurance policy.

Generally, as to jurisdiction, upon constructive service, to garnish a debt due to a nonresident, see note to Starkey v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. L.R.A. 1915F, 880, and earlier notes there referred to.

On right to intervene in attachment proceedings, see note to Potlatch Lumber Co. v. Runkel, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 536.

On right of intervener in attachment to attack validity of service of process, see note to Ballew v. Young, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084.

On nonownership of attached property as ground for vacation of the attachment, see note to Thornley v. Lawbaugh, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1127.

A clear distinction must be made between the question of jurisdiction of an issue raised when a creditor of a nonresident attaches a fund due under an insurance policy to the nonresident debtor, and the question here under annotation; i. e., jurisdiction of the issue between claimants one of whom is a nonresident, the relation of debtor and creditor not existing between them. In the former class of cases the creditor's cause is based upon the theory that the property belongs to the nonresident. He makes affidavit to that fact, and the court takes jurisdiction on the assumption that it is a fact.

But in the latter class of cases, the resident claimant goes into court on the allegation that the nonresident does not own the property or the rights claimed, and asks the court to so decide. He is necessarily in the position of alleging and asking the court to hold that the very fact that would give it jurisdiction is not true. The only possible way to avoid the conclusion that the court lacks jurisdiction is to maintain that ownership by the nonresident is not essential to jurisdiction, i. e., that the proceeding is in rem, in which case the judgment of the court as to the property would be conclusive upon the whole world, which of necessity includes the particular nonresident.

It would hardly be contended, however, that the judgment of a court in New York, for instance, between two claimants to the benefits of an insurance policy, would be conclusive against a third person, the real beneficiary, who lives in California, even if one of the claimants lives in Pennsylvania and was L.R.A.1917B.

served by publication. But this would be the necessary result of holding that the proceeding was strictly in rem.

In PERRY v. YOUNG, ante, 385, the court held that a proceeding to reform an assignment of an insurance policy is so far a proceeding in rem that a court having jurisdiction of the policy, one claimant, and the insurance company has jurisdiction to enter a decree that will bind a nonresident claimant on service by publication. The decision is based upon a supposed analogy between the case before the court and the cases in which it was held that nonresident stockholders may be served with notice by publication when the court has jurisdiction of the corporation that issued the stock. The dissenting judges have sufficiently pointed out the distinction between the two classes of cases. And see the Dunlevy Case discussed, infra.

In PERRY v. YOUNG, the court seems to have overlooked a point which, under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered since the decision in the PERRY CASE, would have been fatal to plaintiff's case, i. e., a court has no jurisdiction to make a final and conclusive adjudication of the personal rights of a nonresident who has not appeared, even though it has property within its jurisdiction which it could appropriate to the payment of his debts. It will be observed that the issue between the parties in the PERRY CASE was not such as could even create the relation of debtor and creditor between the defendant and the plaintiff; that the personal rights of both plaintiff and defendant were created by the same contract that was before the court for final adjudication, and that plaintiff did not claim that there was a debt due and owing from defendant.

In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Dunlevy (1916) 241 U. S. 518, 60 L. ed. 1140, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 613, where an insurance policy had been assigned by the insured to his daughter while they were both residents of the state, and the daughter had become a nonresident after the plaintiff had obtained a judgment against her on a claim not based upon the policy, and had issued an attachment upon the fund that was then due, the insurance company being made garnishee, and the court had, on an interpleader petitioned for by the garnishee, held that the assignment was invalid and had ordered the money, which had been paid into court, to be paid to the assignor, and the payment had been made, it was held by the Federal court that the nonresident assignee, who had not appeared in the attachment proceedings, could maintain an action against the insurance company in the state where she then resided for the recovery of the amount due under the policy, for the reason that the court in the attachment proceedings had no jurisdiction upon constructive service to render a judgment against her on the issue between her and the assignor. Presumably, if it had found that issue in her favor, it could have made a legal appropriation of the fund—or enough of it to pay the judgment—to the attaching creditor, but it had no jurisdiction to finally adjudicate her personal rights as between her and the assignor and award the fund to him leaving her debt unpaid. (It should be observed here that the circuit court of appeals, in (1914) 130 C. C. A. 473, 214 Fed. 1, held that the service upon the nonresident in the attachment case was irregular and invalid for any purpose, but the Supreme Court completely ignored this point, evidently upon the principle that there could not be a service that would give the court jurisdiction to adjudicate the personal rights of the nonresident.) The Supreme Court said: "Beyond doubt, without the necessity of further personal service of process upon Mrs. Dunlevy, the court of common pleas at Pittsburgh had ample power through garnishment proceedings to inquire whether she held a valid claim against the insurance company, and, if found to exist, then to condemn and appropriate it so far as necessary to discharge the original judgment. Although herself outside the limits of the state, such disposition of the property would have been binding on her. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm (1899) 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797; Harris v. Balk (1905) 198 U. S. 215, 226, 227, 49 L. ed. 1023, 1028, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 Ann. Cas. 1084; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Deer (1906) 200 U. S. 176, 50 L. ed. 426, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Hostetter (1916) 240 U. S. 620, 60 L. ed. 829, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Shinn, Attachm. & Garnishment, § 707. See Brigham v. Fayerweather (1886) 140 Mass. 413, 5 N. E. 265. But the interpleader initiated by the company was an altogether different matter. This was an attempt to bring about a final and conclusive adjudication of her personal rights, not merely to discover property and apply it to debts. And unless in contemplation of law she was before the court and required to respond to that issue, its orders and judgments in respect thereto were not binding on her. Pennoyer v. Neff (1877) 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Shinn, Attach. & Garnishment, § 674. See Cross v. Armstrong (1887) 44 Ohio St. 623, 10 N. E. 160."

The district court that tried the Dunlevy Case (1913) 204 Fed. 670, also scored a strong point by the remark that "the judgment of the court of common pleas itself [the state court that tried the attachment suit] determines that it had no jurisdiction of the latter [the person of the nonresident], since it adjudged that the debt levied upon, and which alone would give it jurisdiction, was not the debt of the plaintiff, but of a third party, as against whom the creditors of the plaintiff had no rights."

It was also contended that the jurisdiction of the nonresident's person acquired by the court when the attaching creditor's judgment was rendered against her continued even though she left the state, so that "when the company paid the money into court where she was, it was just the same in legal effect as if it had been paid to her," but the Supreme Court held that this position was untenable. This untenable position was a stronger one than the position of the plaintiff in PERRY v. YOUNG, ante, 385, for in the Dunlevy Case the court had jurisdiction not only of the policy, but of the money due thereon and of the valid judgment against the nonresident, and this was not enough to give it jurisdiction either by virtue of the attachment proceeding or independently of that proceeding. Had the court regarded the action as a proceeding in rem or quasi in rem so as to give full jurisdiction to dispose of the property to a third party, it would no doubt have so held. It would seem that the Dunlevy Case is stronger than the PERRY Case in another respect. In the former there was an actual, bona fide attachment proceeding which gave jurisdiction for one purpose, i. e., to appropriate the nonresident's property to the payment of her debt. But in the latter case there was no debt, hence there was no valid ground for the attachment.

As the question as to the jurisdiction upon constructive service by process involves the question as to due process of law, it would seem that the holding of the Dunlevy Case (U. S.) supra, settles the point and in effect overrules PERRY v. YOUNG.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

T. A. DAVIES et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.
C. E. THOMPSON.

Attachment — sale — property of stranger — attack.

1. An action was instituted in the district court of Montana against E. H. Thompson, and a horse belonging to C. E. Thompson was attached in said action. C. E. Thompson was a nonresident, and no service of process of any kind was had or attempted on him. The court made an order reciting that an immediate sale of said horse was necessary in order to conserve the interest of the parties to the suit, and directed the sheriff to make sale of said horse after giving two days' notice by posting up notices of the time and place of the said sale in three public places in said county. Held, the actual owner of the horse is not bound by said sale, and can attack said proceedings collaterally.

Same — jurisdiction — notice.

2. The court in an attachment action does not acquire jurisdiction to pass absolutely upon the rights of the parties until the defendant has been given legal notice, either actual or constructive, to appear and defend.

For other cases, see Attachment, III. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — effect of judgment.

3. Notices being limited to the debtor, the attached property being proceeded against only as his, and the judgment being against it only as such, the debtor and his privies are concluded. All who are parties to the action are bound, but only the rights of property of the debtor and his privies in the attached property which is condemned and sold are affected by the proceedings.

For other cases, see Judgment, II. c, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Mathews, C., filed the following opinion:

C. E. Thompson will be designated as plaintiff, and T. A. Davies as defendant.

This is an action in replevin instituted in the county court of Tulsa county for the recovery of a certain race horse named "Palatable." Defendant answered by general denial, and further alleged that he had purchased the horse in controversy from one S. Ambrose through the office of the British Columbia Thoroughbred Association of Vancouver, for $700, without any knowledge of any claims of plaintiff to said horse; that on the 21st day of September, 1912, in the district court of the third judicial district of Montana, in an action wherein one William Gemmell was plaintiff and one E. H. Thompson was defendant, an order was issued by the court directing the sheriff to make a sale of the horse in controversy, and that on the 23d day of September, 1912, the said sale was had and the said horse bought in by said William Gemmell, copies of said order of the sheriff's certificate of sale being attached to said answer. To this answer the plaintiff replied by general denial.

At the trial the plaintiff, C. E. Thompson, testified that he had owned the horse in controversy about three years, and that between two and three years before the trial he let a man by the name of Jackson take the horse to Butte, Montana, to race him; that he next heard that Jackson had mortgaged the horse, but that he did not authorize him to do so; that he had never disposed of the horse and still owned him; and that he found the horse in Tulsa in possession of defendants.

The defendant then offered in evidence the following "order" and "certificate of sale:—"

In the District Court of the Third Judicial District of the State of Montana, in and for the County of Deer Lodge. William Gemmell, Plaintiff, v. E. H. Thompson, Defendant. No. 3064. Order.

Upon reading the affidavit of William Gemmell, the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, and it appearing therefrom and from the records and files in the above-entitled action that certain property has been attached, and is now in the custody of the sheriff of Deer Lodge county, under a writ of attachment issued out of the above-entitled court in the above-entitled action; and it appearing to the court satisfactorily that an immediate sale of said property is necessary in order to conserve the interests of the parties thereto; and it appearing from the affidavit aforesaid that the delay necessary to give notice of the application for this order and of the sale of said property would cause material depreciation in the value thereof and material loss, both to the plaintiff and the defendant above named; and it also appearing that the defendant is outside of the state of Montana, L.R.A.1917B.

and that it is impossible to give notice of the hearing of this application and of said sale,

It is therefore ordered, and this does order, that the sheriff of Deer Lodge county make a sale of said property on Monday, the 23d of September, A. D. 1912, and that said sale be made without notice to said defendant, but that notice of the said sale be given by posting notices in writing of the time and place of said sale in three public places in the city of Anaconda, in Deer Lodge county, Montana, for two days prior to September 23, 1912, and that the proceeds of said sale be paid into court, pending the determination of the above-entitled action by final judgment or otherwise.

George B. Winston, Judge.

Dated this 21st day of September, A. D. 1912.

Certificate of Sale.

I, James O'Keefe, sheriff of the county of Deer Lodge, state of Montana, do hereby certify that under and by virtue of an order issued out of the district court of the said county of Deer Lodge in a certain action lately pending in said court at the suit of William Gemmell, plaintiff, against E. H. Thompson, defendant, attested the 21st day of September, A. D. 1912, by which I was commanded to make the sum of nine hundred dollars ($900) with interest and costs, to satisfy the judgment in said action, out of the personal property of said defendant, if sufficient personal property could be found, all as more fully appears by the said order, reference thereunto being hereby made; I have levied on, and on the 23d day of September, A. D. 1912, at the race track in the county of Deer Lodge, state of Montana, duly sold at public auction, according to law and after due and legal notice, to William Gemmell, who made the highest bid therefor at such sale, for the sum of seven hundred dollars ($700) in lawful money of the United States, which was the whole price paid therefor, all the right, title, and interest of the said judgment debtor, E. H. Thompson, in and to the following described personal property; to wit, one chestnut stallion, two years old, no brand, named "Palatable;" one bay gelding named C. W. Kennon, no brand; and bay mare, star in face, named Ourlast, no brand.

Dated this 23d day of September, A. D. 1912.

James O'Keefe, Sheriff of Deer Lodge County, State of Montana.

W. A. McAndrews, Undersheriff.

The plaintiff made the following objections to the introduction of the same, which the court sustained: "We object to the introduction of the exhibit as offered, for the reason that it appears upon its face that it is not a final order or decree; second, that it appears upon its face that it is only an interlocutory order, and not made or based upon the merits of the cause; and, third, it appears upon its face that the court had acquired no jurisdiction either over the person or subject matter or the res or horse attempted to be sold thereunder."

No further evidence was introduced by either party, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal.

The only question presented here by appellants is the correctness of the action of the trial court in excluding the above records of the said Montana court. As we view the case, it is immaterial whether the said records were introduced or not, as the results of this action should have been the same, even if these records had been admitted in evidence, although we are of the opinion that the action of the court in excluding the same was correct; at least upon the last objection urged.

It will be noted the Montana action was against "E. H. Thompson," a nonresident. The property attached belonged to "C. E. Thompson," who was also a nonresident. The kind of service had is not disclosed, but it is presumed, if any was attempted, it was by publication. As C. E. Thompson was not a party to the Montana action it follows no service of any kind was attempted as to him.

It is urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the Montana court acquired no jurisdiction over the horse in controversy, as the records show that if any proceeding had been instituted that it was not against the plaintiff, C. E. Thompson, and therefore not binding upon him. The defendant urges that as the plaintiff only replied to their answer by general denial, that thereby nothing was put in issue except the existence of the record, and consequently a want of jurisdiction in the court to render the judgment cannot be shown under such plea. As said before this becomes immaterial when it is considered that even if the proffered records had been received in evidence it would have had no effect against C. E. Thompson, as the records offered show that they have nothing to do with C. E. Thompson, and therefore do not bind him.

The next proposition advanced by the defendants is that the sale of the property was an action in rem, and that the sale under this order was valid, regardless of who was the owner at that time or of the lack of service. This contention, with the one advanced by plaintiff, set out above, are based somewhat upon the same principle and will, to a certain extent, be discussed together.

While we have been unable to find any decision of this court bearing directly upon the points raised, yet we believe the general principles laid down in the well-considered case of Ballew v. Young, 24 Okla. 182, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084, 103 Pac. 623, followed and discussed in Bilby v. Jones, 39 Okla. 613, 136 Pac. 414, practically decide the issues in the case at bar against defendant's contentions.

In the case of Ballew v. Young, an attachment was sued out and levied upon real property. The defendant was a non-resident, and the publication affidavit and notice were invalid, but the plaintiff there insisted that notwithstanding those facts such defects did not defeat the court's jurisdiction over the property attached so as to render a judgment thereon a nullity and subject to collateral attack. This is practically defendant's contention in the case at bar, but this court, while admitting that there was a conflict in the authorities on that point, there quoted with approval 4 Cyc. 814, as follows: "In some jurisdictions it has been held that the court acquires jurisdiction over the property by a valid levy thereupon, and its judgment in regard thereto is binding until reversed on appeal, or set aside in some direct proceeding for that purpose, but the weight of authority, if not of reason, is to the effect that the jurisdiction acquired by the seizure of the property is not to pass absolutely upon the rights of the parties, but only to pass upon such right after defendant has been given an opportunity to appear and defend; and, where this view is maintained, a judgment rendered without the notice prescribed by law, against a defendant who has not appeared, is deemed absolutely void, and open to collateral attack."

If a judgment rendered in an attachment proceeding wherein the service upon defendant was attempted by publication, but proved to be defective to the extent that it was held void, is subject to collateral attack, as is stated in Ballew v. Young, it equally follows that, in an attachment action where there was no attempt at service upon the owner of the property, the judgment must also be void and subject to collateral attack.

In the case of Troyer v. Wood, 96 Mo. 478, 9 Am. St. Rep. 307, 10 S. W. 42, we find the following discussion of the principles involved in the case at bar: "It is a principle of universal justice that no one shall be condemned in his person or property without notice and opportunity to be heard in his defense. Notice is therefore essential to the jurisdiction of all courts; and the rule which requires that it be given to the party whose interests and rights are sought to be affected by judicial proceedings is as old as the law itself. A judgment without notice given, without opportunity to be heard, possesses none of the attributes of a judicial determination; it is simply judicial usurpation and oppression, a mere arbitrary edict based upon an ex parte statement and entered upon the records of the courts in defiance of the maxim, 'Audi alteram partem.' Such a judgment deserves not the name it bears, and will not be respected and upheld in any forum where right and justice are administered. This doctrine is met with and approved at almost every turn you take in the broad fields of adjudication, and is announced by authorities too numerous for computation. Nations v. Johnson, 24 How. 203, 16 L. ed. 631; Walden v. Craig, 14 Pet. 154, 10 L. ed. 397; Webster v. Reid, 11 How. 437, 13 L. ed. 761; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959; Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914; Earle v. McVeigh, 91 U. S. 503, 23 L. ed. 398; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Rockwell v. Nearing, 35 N. Y. 302; Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 261; Freeman, Judgm. 3d ed §§ 117, 118, 495; Hitchcock v. Aicken, 1 Caines, 473; Blackwell, Tax Titles, 213. But notice may be either actual or constructive, and the state possesses the power to substitute service by publication in lieu of personal service; but such substituted service, when authorized or permitted by law, is as much an element of jurisdiction as is personal service where trial is the only method of service prescribed. Re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 199. And proceedings in rem or quasi in rem are not exempt from the operation of the rule which makes service of notice in some form an essential of jurisdiction. Cooley, Const. Lim. 2d ed. 498, 499, 500, and cases cited; Wells, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 88; Wade, Notice, 2d ed. §§ 1144, 1161; Waples, Proceedings in Rem, §§ 88, 570 et seq. and cases cited; Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65; Denning v. Corwin, 11 Wend. 647; Freeman v. Thompson, 53 Mo. 196, and cases cited."

While the case last quoted involved a judgment for taxes, yet a judgment for taxes is the same in effect as judgments in other actions. Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477, 91 Am. Dec. 595.

In the case of National Bank v. Peters, 51 Kan. 62, 32 Pac. 637, it is said: "Notice being limited to the debtor, the attached property being proceeded against only as his, and the judgment being against it only as such, the debtor and his privies are concluded. All who are parties to the action are bound, but only the rights of property of the debtor and his privies in the attached property which is condemned and sold are affected by the proceedings."

We take the following from the case of Bank of Colfax v. Richardson, 34 Or. 518, 75 Am. St. Rep. 664, 54 Pac. 359:

"Under our system an attachment is merely auxiliary to the main action, and there is no difference in the proceedings thereon in an action brought against a nonresident, upon whom service is necessarily made by publication, and in one brought against a resident of the state, in which personal service is had. In either case the proceedings on attachment have nothing to do with the merits of the cause of action, or the jurisdiction of the court to try and determine the controversy between the parties. If personal service is had, the cause becomes a mere action in personam, with the added incident that the property attached remains liable for any judgment the plaintiff may recover. But if service is had by publication, and there is no appearance for the defendant, the action is practically a proceeding in rem against the attached property, the only effect of which is to subject it to the payment of the amount which the court may find due the plaintiff. Where no personal service is had, the res is brought within the power and control of the court by a seizure under a writ of attachment, but the right to adjudicate thereon is acquired only by the publication of the summons. It is the substituted service, and not the seizure, which gives the court jurisdiction to establish by its judgment a demand against the defendant, and to subject the property brought within its custody to the payment of that demand. In other words, the authority to hear and proceed to judgment depends upon the service of the process and the actual seizure of the thing to be concluded by the judgment, and not upon the regularity of the proceedings by which the control of the property was acquired. When, therefore, the court has the de facto custody of the property by virtue of a de facto writ of attachment, and a right to determine whether such property shall be subject to the payment of plaintiff's demand by virtue of constructive service of process, it has full and complete jurisdiction in the premises, and subsequent errors or irregularities in the proceedings will not be available on collateral attack. A judgment founded on service of process by publication is, of course, ineffectual, unless it is an adjudication concerning property which the court has in its custody under some lawful process, because there is nothing upon which it can operate; but where the property has been actually seized and brought within the control of the court by some process authorized by law, and the right to determine its liability for the demands of the plaintiff is subsequently acquired by publication, an error of the court in determining the status of the property, or its liability, or the validity of the attachment, can, it seems to us, no more affect the jurisdiction, under a statute like ours, than an erroneous decision as to the amount of plaintiff's demand, or any other error in the case. Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, 257, 838; Paul v. Smith, 82 Ky. 451; Barelli v. Wagner, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 27 S. W. 17; Thompson v. Eastburn, 16 N. J. L. 100; Diehl v. Page, 3 N. J. Eq. 143.

"There is much conflict in the authorities generally as to whether the statutory prerequisites to the issuance of writs of attachment are jurisdictional and must affirmatively appear to protect the proceedings from collateral attack, or whether, in the absence of any showing in the record to the contrary, it will be presumed that the steps necessary to vest the court with jurisdiction were taken. Mr. Waples states with apparent confidence that all the statutory requirements are jurisdictional, and are not to be presumed after judgment, even on a collateral attack, and cites a large number of cases which more or less directly support the text (Waples, Attachm. § 625); while Mr. Works, with equal confidence, says that, while there are authorities holding that such proceedings are special, and that no presumptions in favor of the jurisdiction of the court can be indulged, 'the clear weight of authority and reason is to the contrary' (Works, Courts & Jurisdiction, p. 547); and this seems to be the view of Judge Van Fleet, as will be seen by reference to the citation from his work on Collateral Attack, already made." Ward v. Boyce, 152 N. Y. 191, 36 L.R.A. 549, 40 N. E. 180; Yarbrough v. Pugh, 63 Wash. 140, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 351, 114 Pac. 918, 2 R. C. L. § 4, p. 803.

Now as to defendant's contention that, as the horse was sold as perishable property under a chambers order of the Montana court, a sale under such an order operated to give the purchaser at said sale a good title notwithstanding the horse may have belonged to plaintiff, and not to E. H. Thompson, the defendant in that action.

Counsel has cited many respectable authorities (4 Cyc. 716; Young v. Kellar, 94 Mo. 581, 4 Am. St. Rep. 405, 7 S. W. 293; Megee v. Beirne, 39 Pa. 50; Millard v. Hall, 24 Ala. 230; and O'Brien v. Norris, 16 Md. 122, 77 Am. Dec. 284), which seems to support his contention, but upon this point there are many authorities to the contrary, and we believe the holding in the case of Ballew v. Young, 24 Okla. 182, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1084, 103 Pac. 623, upon the general principle there laid down that a judgment rendered in an attachment proceeding wherein the service by publication was void is subject to collateral attack, is equally applicable to the point here under consideration. There was no service of summons, either actual or constructive, upon C. E. Thompson; therefore as to him the attachment proceedings were void and open to collateral attack.

In the case of Sleeper v. Killion, 166 Iowa, 205, 147 N. W. 314, the court says: "Men are known, and their identity fixed, by the name by which they are known. When addressed by name, they respond as segregated individual entities. When not so addressed, they, as a rule, are not expected or required to respond. In nearly every state in which courts acquire jurisdiction by writ, summons, or process, it is required that the paper, on the service of which the court assumes a right to act, must be addressed to the party summoned by his true name, or by the name by which he is generally known. It has been uniformly held that a writ, summons, or process to one, but served on another, gives the court no jurisdiction of the person served, although he be the real party to the suit, and the one against whom relief is sought."

In the case of D'Autremont v. Anderson Iron Co. (D'Autremont v. Gaylord) 104 Minn. 165, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 236, 124 Am. St. Rep. 615, 116 N. W. 357, 15 Ann. Cas. 114, it was held that a summons served by publication, designated "George H. Leslie" as defendant, was fatal, and conferred no jurisdiction upon the court to adjudicate any rights of "George W. Leslie." The court says: "Though the partition suit was a proceeding in rem, the mere fact that the court acquired jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof, the land, did not authorize it to adjudicate the rights or interests of parties in the absence of proper service of summons upon them."

The court further said: "The reasons for disregarding the error where there is personal service upon the right party do not apply where the only service is by publication against a nonresident of the state."

Further the court says: "If the error in the name is jurisdictional, as we hold, a judgment entered is void, and to adopt the contention of appellant would result in compelling a defendant in a particular case to waive the want of jurisdiction in the court to enter judgment against him, and to come to this state and litigate the cause on its merits. This the court has no right to do. The law providing for the manner of acquiring jurisdiction over nonresidents is plain, and should not be ignored even in a case of apparent hardship."

In Klondike Lumber Co. v. Bender Wagon Co. 71 Ark. 339, 75 S. W. 855, the precise question was involved. The case was an appeal from a judgment in an action of replevin. The court, in its opinion, says: "The title of the Bender Wagon Company rested upon a sale made by virtue of an order of the circuit judge in vacation. Whether this was a valid sale and passed the title of the lumber was the question raised by the action of replevin. If the sale was valid, then the wagon company was entitled to the lumber, otherwise not."

The court, further passing upon the question, said: "The only remaining question for us to determine is whether the sale of the lumber made under the order of the circuit judge in vacation was a valid sale. The order for the sale was, as before stated, made in an action brought in the circuit court by Williams Brothers against the Long Pine Lumber Company to enforce a lien for labor upon the lumber replevied in this action. Now we find in the statute regulating the proceedings for the enforcement of laborers' liens no provision authorizing the sale of the property by an order of the judge made in vacation, and there is room for doubt as to whether the judge in vacation can order such a sale in actions of that kind. But there is a provision in the statute regulating proceedings in actions of attachment authorizing the judge in vacation to order the sale of perishable property, and this is no doubt the statute under which the judge acted in this case. That section provides that 'no such sale shall be made in vacation without reasonable notice in writing to the opposite party or his attorney, if either of them reside in the county in which the cause is pending, of the time and place of the application therefor.' Sandels & H. Dig. § 348.

"Now, the Long Pine Lumber Company was the party sued in that case, but the evidence shows, and the court found, that this company was not the owner of the lumber sold. The lumber was owned by the Klondike Lumber Company, and that company was not a party to the suit until after the order for the sale of the lumber was made, and had no notice of the application for the sale of the lumber. Under these circumstances the sale of the lumber did not affect any right or interest which the Klondike Lumber Company had in the lumber. The sale did not affect their title. The company, after the sale, still owned the lumber, subject, of course, to any valid liens existing against it, and had the right to recover the same from the purchaser at the sale, for the purchaser acquired only the right, title, and interest therein owned by the Long Pine Lumber Company, the defendant in the action. Crowell v. Barham, 57 Ark. 195, 21 S. W. 33."

In the instant case it will be seen that the record sought to be introduced recites: "I have levied on, and on the 23d day of September, 1912, at the race track in the county of Deer Lodge, state of Montana, duly sold at public auction, according to law, and after due and legal notice to William Gemmell, who made the highest bid therefor, at public sale, for the sum of $700 in lawful money of the United States, which was the whole price paid therefor, all the right, title, and interest of the said judgment debtor, E. H. Thompson, in and to the following described personal property."

The certificate of sale also recites that the sale was made for the reason that he was commanded to make the sum of $900 to satisfy the judgment against "E. H. Thompson." Hornthall v. Burwell, 109 N. C. 10, 13 L.R.A. 740, 26 Am. St. Rep. 556, 13 S. E. 721.

For the reasons given, we recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

Adopted in whole.

Annotation—Effect of attachment and sale of stranger's property.

This note does not deal with the question of jurisdiction when the claimant resides out of the state and has been served with constructive notice. One phase of that question is discussed in the note to PERRY v. YOUNG, ante, 395.

It is a general rule that a judgment in an attachment proceeding is binding only upon the parties to the suit. 6 C. J. 33, § 26. It would seem to be a necessary deduction from this rule that a claimant to the attached property who is not made a party in some way would not be bound by the judgment, and this would be true even where an attempt is made to make him a party, but the attempt fails because of irregularity or illegality of an attempted service of process, as well as where no such attempt is made. Such an attempt would not constitute service. On the effect of summons or notice to person by wrong initial, see note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 151, and notes there referred to. But in DAVIES v. THOMPSON, ante, 395, the service was not on, or intended to be on, the person who was the real owner. So, for the purposes of this note, it is assumed that there was either no notice or one so defective that it was considered of no value.

It would seem to be inconceivable that a court would hold that the owner of property sold under order of court in an attachment proceeding to which he was not made a party by service of some kind is barred of all right to maintain an action of some sort against someone. It might be that his action should be against the sheriff (see Megee v. Beirne (Pa.) infra), or perhaps against the garnishee (see Olin v. Figeroux (S. C.) infra), or perhaps against the purchaser of the property (see DAVIES v. THOMPSON).

In Megee v. Beirne (1861) 39 Pa. 50, it was held that there is no rule of law that compels the owner of property attached as that of another, to intervene on penalty of forfeiting his rights, even if he knows of the fact. It was also held that if the order of court for the sale of perishable property attached, and a sale thereunder, are conceded to be so far a proceeding in rem that the title of the purchaser is indefeasible, still the real owner, who was not a party to the proceeding, could recover from the sheriff who sold the property, although he knew that the property had been attached in time to intervene.

In Olin v. Figeroux (1841) 1 McMull. L. (S. C.) 203, it was held that there is nothing in the attachment laws that compels a claimant of attached property to come into court and defend his title, unless he is made a party to the suit, even if he knows that the property has been attached. If he does not, the judgment is not binding upon him, and he is not estopped from collecting the debt from the garnishee, who paid the money into court in the attachment proceeding.

In some jurisdictions anyone claiming to own property that has been attached as that of another may intervene and have his rights determined, but in other jurisdictions this is not allowable. See note to Polatch Lumber Co. v. Runkel, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 536.

So it has been held that there is no rule of law which compels the owner of property to intervene when it is attached as the property of another on penalty of forfeiting his rights, even where he has actual notice of the attachment. McGee v. Beirne (Pa.) and Olin v. Figeroux (S. C.) supra. These questions of intervention are, of course, not within the scope of this note, but they may form the basis for a conclusion upon the question of the owner's right to attack the judgment in attachment collaterally. #### TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

MRS. A. B. McMILLAN
v.

AMERICAN SUBURBAN CORPORATION,
Appt.

(— Tenn. —, 188 S. W. 615.)

Vendor and purchaser — failure to make improvements — rescission.

One who has paid the purchase price and taken possession of real estate cannot, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or insolvency of vendor, rescind the contract for the vendor's breach of his agreement to lay water mains to the property, but he must rely on his legal remedies.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, I. e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(October 14, 1916.)

Note. — The right of a vendee to rescind contract for sale of land because of vendor's breach of covenant to make improvements is discussed in the annotation following this case, post, 403.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to rescind a contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
Mr. Reuben L. Cates for appellant.
Mr. A. C. Grimm for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of complaint is one praying for the rescission of a contract in relation to realty.

Defendant company is the owner of a tract of about 100 acres of land in the suburbs of Knoxville, which in 1906 it subdivided into blocks and lots, giving the addition the name of "Piedmont Place," and put the property on the market for sale on the instalment plan. The method of business was to take from those proposing to purchase a written application, and in the event of acceptance by the company it executed a contract to convey or "bond for deed."

Complainant in December, 1906, purchased a lot in the subdivision at the price of $500, and in the application signed by her, and also in the contract for deed signed by the company, there were inserted certain restrictions in favor of the vendor company and the following guaranties in favor of the purchaser:

"The American Suburban Corporation guarantees the following improvements:

"A. That the streets and sidewalks on the property will be graded and shade trees planted.

"B. That granolithic sidewalks will be laid in front of the lot herein named.

"C. That water pipes will be laid in Piedmont Place."

In January, 1911, complainant completed her payments, and at that time received a deed from the corporation which incorporated the restrictive conditions in favor of the company, but omitted any reference to its guaranties. Complainant surrendered the contract for conveyance at the same time.

Prior to the institution of this suit the company had spent $8,826 in grading streets and sidewalks and in planting shade trees. A sidewalk was laid in front of complainant's lot as well as in other parts of the property.

At the date the suit was brought water pipe lines were not laid, but in the summer of 1912, following suit and before final decree in the cause, water lines were laid at a cost of $4,548. Prior to that, however, complainant had been insisting on the laying of the water lines, but without success. The bill was filed May 24, 1912, praying for rescission.

The cases are not numerous that deal with the right of a vendee to rescind an executory contract for the sale of land because of the vendor's breach of a covenant or guaranty to make improvements. This fact is commented on, and the decisions collated, in a note to Crampton v. McLaughlin Realty Co. 51 Wash. 525, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 823, 99 Pac. 586. In that case it was held that a vendee of real property cannot rescind because of the vendor's breach of his covenant to lay sidewalks and pavements and put in water mains and sewers, where such covenant is one of several relating to building restrictions, etc., on the theory that the covenant was to be deemed an independent one, and, therefore, that the vendee's remedy for its breach was an action for damages.

The decision was, in part, rested on the authority of American Emigrant Co. v. Adams County, 100 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 563, which involved a covenant by the vendor to drain the land sold. In an action to rescind, the court in the last-mentioned case said: "The allegations of the bill, to the effect that the emigrant company has not fulfilled its engagements with respect to the drainage and settlement of the land, rest in covenant merely, and afford no ground for avoiding the contract. Where covenants are mutual and dependent, the failure of one party to perform absolves the other, and authorizes him to rescind the contract. But here the contract was largely carried into execution soon after its inception. The engagements of the appellants to introduce settlers and the like were to be performed in the future; and their performance was not made a condition, but, as before stated, rested in covenant. In case of a breach, they would lay the foundation of an action, but nothing more."

See also Fountain v. Semi-Tropic Land & Water Co. 99 Cal. 677, 34 Pac. 497.

A few decisions on the point have appeared since the date of the note referred to.

In Cheney v. Bierkamp, 58 Colo. 321, 145 Pac. 691, the breach relied on was of an agreement to raise the level of laterals, for irrigation purposes, on the realty sold. The purchase price of the land was $2,500, and the cost of raising the laterals was about $75. The court held that the agreement in respect to the lateral was not an essential part of the consideration or a dependent covenant, but a minor detail, distinct and separable from the principal agreement, and that the proper remedy was not rescission, but an action for damages on breach. The purchaser had gone into possession of the property.

In Tennant Land Co. v. Nordeman, 148 Ky. 361, 146 S. W. 756, the covenant was to construct a sewer, water and gas mains, with connections to the property lines, concrete sidewalks and curbing, and a modern asphalt roadway. There was a failure as to all features except the sidewalks. The court held that a case for rescission was made.

In Laser v. Forbes, 105 Ark. 166, 150 S. W. 691, the agreement on the part of the vendor was to grade and lay sewer pipes in front of the property and build cement sidewalks along its street line. After paying seven monthly instalments of the purchase price, the vendee elected to rescind. The court, after commenting on the facts that the contract was entirely executory and that plaintiff had never been put in possession of the property, said: "Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the breach by defendant of this material provision of the contract entitled the plaintiff to rescind his purchase and to recover the money paid thereon as for money had and received."

In our opinion these more recent cases announce the better doctrine as regards executory contracts. An agreement to lay water or sewer lines to a lot is to be deemed a material inducement, so affecting the consideration as to be of the essence of the contract of sale. It is not to be regarded as a minor detail, independent of or separable from the agreement whereby the vendor agreed to sell. The sale of the lot without connection with such lines would not be contemplated in all likelihood. The test for rescission is the materiality of the covenant to improve in the given case, rather than any metaphysical notion touching the mutuality or dependency of covenants.

It does not follow, however, that a rescission was properly awarded in this case, the contract here involved being an executed one. The vendee had completed her payments, taken a deed, and gone into possession. The above cases relate to executory contracts, save Tennant Land Co. v. Norde-man, in which the facts closely parallel those of the instant case. The court's attention in that case apparently was not directed to the distinction; no comment of the court discloses that it was in mind.

As has been well said, the power of a court of equity to decree the rescission of an executed contract and order its surrender for cancellation is one of the most delicate powers it is ever called upon to exercise. The equitable remedy of rescission is not one enforceable as a matter of right, and the court should not award it in a case where some such element as actual fraud, accident, mistake, or insolvency does not appear to justify it. This is true even though the circumstances are such that, where the contract still executory, the court would grant that relief. The vendee is left to resort to his legal remedy for damages for the breach.

It cannot be claimed on this record that the contract of sale was induced by fraud or mistake, or that the vendor company is insolvent.

If there has been a failure to cause water lines to be laid, such as the contract calls for to serve the contract purpose, the situation is to be likened to one of a partial deficiency in the thing purchased. In such case the vendee in possession under an executed contract is remitted to his legal remedy. Kansas City Land Co. v. Hill, 87 Tenn. 589, 5 L.R.A. 45, 11 S. W. 797, and cases cited.

In our opinion the Court of Civil Appeals was in error in decreeing a rescission. Reversed, and the bill of complaint dismissed.

Annotation—Right of vendee to rescind contract for sale of land because of vendor's breach of covenant to make improvements.

The earlier cases on the right to rescind an executory contract are discussed in the note to Crampton v. McLaughlin Realty Co. 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 823. Since the date of that note, the right of a purchaser who had paid a part of the purchase price and entered into possession of the land, to rescind the contract for breach of the vendor's agreement, in case a portion of the land was too high, to put it under irrigation by raising or changing the irrigation lateral or by shaving off the top of the land, thereby lowering its surface, has been denied where only a very small part of the land was affected by the clause and the agreement could have been complied with at a very small relative cost. Cheney v. Bierkamp (1914) 58 Colo. 321, 145 Pac. 691. See further in regard to this case McMILLAN v. AMERICAN SUBURBAN CORPORATION, ante, 401.

On the contrary it has been held that, where the covenant of the vendor as to improvements and the other covenants in the contract are dependent, the breach by the vendor of his contract to make improvements does furnish ground for rescission. Ihrke v. Continental L. Ins. & Invest. Co. (1916) 91 Wash. 342, L.R.A.1916F, 430, 157 Pac. 866, in which it was held that a breach by the vendor of fruit land, of his agreement to plant fruit trees upon the parcels sold, care for them for a period of years, and turn over to the purchaser a bearing orchard, justified a rescission of the contract by the purchaser. With reference to the covenants, the court states that they are mutual and dependent. "The very contract is to convey a tract of land with a bearing orchard, which was to be planted and matured prior to the time the last of the payments were due. There was no separation in regard to the consideration."

And it has been held that the vendee is entitled to rescind the contract for breach of the covenant to make improvements where the contract is entirely executory and the parties can be placed in statu quo. Laser v. Forbes (1912) 105 Ark. 166, 150 S. W. 691; Laser v. Fowler (1914) — Ark. —, 170 S. W.

223 (agreement was to surface grade and lay sewer pipe in front of property, and build a 4-foot cement sidewalk along the street line). In Laser v. Forbes (Ark.) supra, the purchaser had paid seven monthly instalments on the purchase price, while in Laser v. Fowler (Ark.) supra, the entire purchase price had been paid, but the purchaser, who had never taken possession, refused to accept a deed tendered because the contract had not been complied with. Recovery of the amount paid was allowed in each case. The Arkansas court does not expressly consider whether the covenants were dependent, but states in Laser v. Forbes, supra: "In the contract there were mutual obligations which were assumed by both parties; the promises therein made by one were the consideration for the promises made by the other, and the failure or refusal by one to fulfil his promises justified a rescission of the contract by the other." See discussion in McMILLAN v. AMERICAN SUBURBAN CORP. ante, 401, as to resting the right to rescind upon the mutuality or dependency of the covenants.

The sales in Laser v. Forbes and in Laser v. Fowler were of land in an addition being developed by the vendor. The agreement of the vendor to make the improvement provided that "these improvements will be made as fast as 25 per cent of the money received from the sale of the property will pay for the same." In Laser v. Forbes, the vendor urged that the required amount of improvements had been made upon other property in the addition, and that improvements in any part of the addition were sufficient to comply with the covenant, the entire amount of improvements called for not being required until all the lots were sold and payments made thereon. This contention was denied, the court stating that "the contract is a separate one disconnected with any other sale that the defendant made or will make of any other lot in the addition. The contract makes no reference to any other property in the addition or to other proposed sales thereof, but specifically provides that to the extent of 25 per cent of the payments made by plaintiff surface grading should be made and sewer pipes laid 'in front of' the blocks described in the contract, and that a cement sidewalk should be built along 'the street line of said property.' The plain meaning of this language of this provision of the contract is that these improvements shall be made in effect upon the property described in the contract out of the L.R.A.1917B.

purchase money paid thereon. . . . The amount received from plaintiff on the contract up to the time he claimed a rescission amounted to $1,530, 25 per cent of which was sufficient to pay for the character of improvements named in the above provision upon this property. But defendant not only failed to make any of these improvements upon this property, but refused to do so, claiming and asserting the right to expend the money thus collected from plaintiff for improvements made upon other property in the addition. This he had no right to do, and by so doing he not only violated the obligation he assumed by the terms of this provision of the contract, but evinced an intention not to comply therewith."

But in Dowling v. Miller-Kendig Real Estate Co. (1909) 115 N. Y. Supp. 154, a purchaser of a lot in an addition was held not entitled to recover the purchase price for the vendor's failure to lay a sidewalk in front of his premises, but this decision is based upon the ground that not sufficient time had been given for the construction of the improvement, the court stating: "This enterprise shows many hundreds of lots facing on many streets; a purchaser in these circumstances should realize that such a clause related to the enterprise generally. To say arbitrarily that defendant must at once or within two years place these sidewalks in front of the lots of each purchaser, or return the purchase price paid on account, would result in a construction of the contract not jointly contemplated by the parties."

A case of some interest in this connection, although not involving an agreement by the vendor to make improvements, is the decision in Aurand v. Perry Town Lot & Improv. Co. (1916) — Iowa, —, 159 N. W. 779, where a purchaser of a lot in an addition some distance from the business portion of the city was held entitled to rescind the contract, in which the seller guaranteed to the buyer that within two years from the date of the contract a street railway would be built and in operation from the main business portion of the city across the addition in which the lot was located, no such street railway having been built.

In Miller v. Beck (1914) 72 Or. 140, 142 Pac. 603, a purchaser of lots in a tract, under a contract entitling him to a right of way for road purposes along adjoining tracts until such time as a road shall be opened along the front of the lots purchased, is held entitled to rescind the contract and recover the amount paid, where the road along the adjoining tracts was closed and the vendor refused to open the road mentioned in the contract.

A vendee is not entitled to recover a sum paid to the vendors, who had agreed to make certain alterations in the premises prior to the taking of title, because the alterations were made without first filing the plans and specifications thereof with the municipal authorities, where the alterations were made in accordance with the requirement of the law. Umburg v. Neinken (1908) 128 App. Div. 165, 112 N. Y. Supp. 618.

There is little authority as to the right of a vendee to rescind a contract for the sale of realty because of vendor's breach of his covenant to make improvements, where the contract has been executed. It is held in Tennant Land Co. v. Nordeman (1912) 148 Ky. 361, 146 S. W. 756, that a purchaser of suburban property has a right to rescind for breach of his vendor's covenant to construct a sewer, water and gas mains with connections to the property line, concrete sidewalks, curbing, and a modern asphalt roadway. The court states: "It is manifest that the improvements contemplated by the contract were necessary to its proper enjoyment as a home or to its profitable sale; that being true, they constituted an essential part of the consideration."

In McMillan v. American Suburban Corp. ante, 401, the purchaser had completed the payment, taken a deed, and gone into possession. This is treated as an execution of the contract, and rescission thereof is refused for this reason. In Tennant Land Co. v. Nordeman (Ky.) supra, the contract between the parties contained the stipulation that the improvements of a street as advertised were included in the price named in the contract. According to the advertisement the vendor agreed to construct the improvements above mentioned. The advertisement stated that the improvements were well under way and would be completed in the fall of 1906. The purchase was made in the early part of 1907, and about two years and a half thereafter the purchaser accepted deeds to the land purchased, and executed his note for the balance of the purchase price. This was urged as constituting a ratification of the contract and a waiver of the grounds upon which a rescission was asked.

It is true, as stated in McMillan v. American Suburban Corp. ante, 401, that the court in Tennant Land Co. v. Nordeman did not consider the question of an executed contract; but in answer to the argument that the right to rescission had been waived, the court states that the purchase under the conditions above stated did not amount to a waiver of his right to rescind, because the vendor was attempting all the time to carry out the agreement and was assuring the purchaser that it would be carried out. That being true, it is stated that it was not apparent at the time of the acceptance of the deeds that the improvements would not be made. When it did become reasonably apparent that the improvements contracted for would not be made, the purchaser elected to rescind.

It is held in Braddy v. Elliott (1908) 146 N. O. 578, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1121, 125 Am. St. Rep. 52, 60 S. E. 507, that the mere failure by one party to an exchange of land to comply with his agreement to construct buildings on the land granted by him is not sufficient to justify a rescission of the entire contract by a court of equity.

Divorce — opening decree — fraud.

1. A court will reopen and try a divorce case if the decree which has been entered therein is the result of fraud practised upon the other party or upon the court.

For other cases, see Judgment, VII. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — sufficiency of case made.

2. A divorce decree may be opened if promptly attacked when the record bears marks of collusion, and the prosecuting attorney was not called upon to inquire into the merits of the case, while the divorcée alleges that the facts alleged in the petition were untrue, that plaintiff's attorney represented her, and that she was induced not to appear by threats of suicide on the part of her husband, while his real purpose in securing the divorce was to marry another. For other cases, see Judgment, VII. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(July 8, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for King County, dismissing a petition filed to vacate a decree of divorce, and for permission to withdraw her answer and defend the suit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred C. Brown, for appellant:

A decree of divorce will be set aside when there is duress, coercion, or collusion.

McDonald v. McDonald, 34 Wash. 294, 75 Pac. 865; Danforth v. Danforth, 105 Ill. 603; Rawlins v. Rawlins, 18 Fla. 345; Maher v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. 95 Ill. App. 365; 23 Cyc. 917, 919, 921.

Mr. J. D. Bauer, for respondent:

A decree granted through fraud and perjury is voidable only, and will only be set aside by the court which granted it upon the strongest evidence.

23 Cyc. 1022.

Generally, a general statute permitting the opening of a judgment for fraud does not apply to divorce decrees.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On September 1, 1908, a decree of divorce was entered in the superior court of King county, dissolving the bonds of matrimony then existing between appellant and respondent. On October 1, 1908, appellant filed her petition under the statute, praying for an order vacating the decree, and for permission to withdraw her answer and defend the suit. For the sake of the discussion of the only legal proposition involved we deem it necessary to set out, in part, at least, the facts alleged in her petition. She sets up the original complaint, in which her husband had asked a divorce upon the ground that she had treated him with extreme cruelty, had refused to live with him, had heaped personal indignities upon him, rendering his life burdensome, and that there was such incompatibility of temper between them that they could no longer live together as husband and wife. No facts were alleged in his complaint that would have saved the pleading from an attack by general demurrer. To this complaint she had entered a general denial. The trial was had without her presence, and a decree entered, so far as the record shows, upon the respondent's testimony alone. She further alleges that, prior to November, 1907, the relations existing from the time of their marriage in March, 1882, had been most amicable; that she had been a dutiful wife, and that he had been a fond, faithful, and indulgent husband; that from the time mentioned he began to grow cold and distant, and cease to manifest that love and affection that had so long characterized his conduct toward her; that in June, 1908, he requested her to procure a divorce; that this she refused to do; that his inattention and neglect then became more marked, until finally, with intent to deceive her as to his real motive, he more than once threatened to commit suicide unless she consented to allow him to procure a divorce; that he procured a revolver, and made a pretended attempt to take his life; that his conduct so terrorized her and their children that she was reduced in health, and so shocked in her nervous system that she was induced to believe that he would commit suicide, and so she yielded to his demand; that thereafter, on August 28th, he sent an attorney, whom he had employed, to her with a copy of the summons and complaint, together with an answer which he had prepared; that she signed the answer; that respondent thereafter telephoned her that he would take his life if she resisted the divorce, or appeared in the court room at the hearing; all of which she believed, and for that reason she did not appear. She further alleges that all of the facts set forth in his complaint were false and untrue; that his threats of suicide were made with fraudulent intent to cover his real purpose, which was to marry another,—a purpose he had thereafter admitted to her; that she has a good defense to his complaint, and that he has neglected her and their children, so that they are in necessitous circumstances. It would seem that this recital was enough to warrant the court in vacating the decree, and we take it that it would have done so but for its conception of the case of Metler v. Metler, 32 Wash. 494, 73 Pac. 535, wherein this court said: "The reasons for making this distinction between judgments in this particular action and judgments in ordinary actions are apparent. A decree of divorce affects the status of the parties, both with respect to their relations to one another and their relations to the public. By the terms of the statute divorced persons may lawfully marry after a limited time from the rendition of the decree, and to permit its vacation is to make it possible, under the guise of law, to inflict injury and suffering upon persons whose innocence entitles them to every protection the law can afford. It is therefore highly important, not only for the sake of the parties thereto, but also for the sake of such persons, that decrees of divorce should not be granted except, for specific causes provided by law, proved, and found by the court, in actions where the court has undoubted jurisdiction over the subject matter and the parties; but it is also equally important that the decree, when once granted, be not disturbed by the court granting it."

The power of a court having jurisdiction of the parties to vacate a decree of divorce once formally entered is therefore squarely before us. In the Metler Case the court also said: "The court can, of course, lawfully vacate such a decree when entered without jurisdiction, and perhaps where it is the result of fraud practised on the court or the other spouse." The Metler Case was referred to in McDonald v. McDonald, 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865, wherein it was said: "It would seem to be violative of fundamental principles to hold that a divorce decree, fraudulently procured, may not be timely assailed by the innocent party to the proceedings." It would seem, therefore, that, notwithstanding the doctrine frequently announced that a decree of divorce will never be vacated because of the probable evil consequences following the severance of a new relation, bearing, as it might, after-begotten children, the better rule is that, notwithstanding the decree, a court will reopen and try the case if the decree is the result of a fraud practised upon the other party or upon the court.

This rule is admitted in the case of Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Kan. 181, cited and relied upon by respondent, although the court refused to reopen the decree, finding no irregularity in the proceeding. This case, L.R.A.1917B.

however, was distinguished in the later case of Hemphill v. Hemphill, 38 Kan. 220, 16 Pac. 457, wherein the rule here announced was declared. In the case of Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437, cited by respondent, the distinction between the force of a decree entered upon constructive service, the statute having been strictly complied with, and a fraud upon the party or the court, is clearly pointed out. It was held that the decree would not be vacated where summons was regularly had by publication, but that the court had power in all cases to vacate a decree obtained by fraud, even though the plaintiff may have subsequently married and become a parent. The case of Ewing v. Ewing, 24 Ind. 468, also relied upon by respondent, followed the case of McQuigg v. McQuigg, 13 Ind. 294. In the case of Earle v. Earle, 91 Ind. 27, after a careful review of all the authorities, the court held that a decree of divorce obtained by fraud may be vacated and set aside as any other decree thus obtained. Continuing, the court said: "We think, therefore, that when such a wrong has been consummated in the obtaining of decrees of divorce, the courts have the right, and owe the duty, to set them aside and declare them null and void, and that, as far as the case of McQuigg v. McQuigg, supra, and the cases following it, conflict with the conclusion reached, they should be overruled. Very much good we think will come from the adoption of the rule in divorce cases, and no harm, provided the injured party is not negligent in moving upon the discovery of the fraud. Possibly, in some cases, a second husband or wife may innocently be made to suffer, but, with proper restriction, this is not more likely than in the reversal of decrees on appeal to this court. It is proper and right in the administration of the law to protect innocent third parties, who may marry a divorced man or woman, but it is quite as proper and important to protect the husband and wife and innocent children from fraudulent divorces. Some of the cases in this state, in which relief has been denied, are forcible illustrations of the necessity of the rule here adopted. The adoption of the rule is essential to the complete administration of justice, will tend to protect the courts and the family from fraud and wrong, and will serve as a warning to those inclined to practise such fraud." The doctrine of this case has been followed in the later case of Nicholson v. Nicholson, 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223. The case of O'Connell v. O'Connell, 10 Neb. 390, 6 N. W. 467, is also relied on. That the force of this case as an authority had been weakened by the subsequent decisions of that court was insinuated but not discussed by the court in Smithson v. Smithson, 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300. It is unnecessary to review other cases cited by respondent, and which only incidentally bear upon our discussion.

The reason for the better rule is aptly stated in Brown v. Brown, 58 N. Y. 609, wherein the chapter of the Code allowing vacation of decrees and judgments and the power of the court thereunder was clearly defined. "Under that provision [in relation to opening judgments] the period of seven years must elapse before a judgment founded on publication can be reposed upon as final. It is obvious that such a provision is inappropriate to actions for divorce. They were therefore excepted from it. But the power which the courts had, before the Code, over their own judgments and records is not interfered with. It is not contended that § 135, or any other, takes away the power of the court to open a judgment of divorce entered upon default, where the summons has been personally served, and it would indeed be an anomaly to give so much greater effect to one entered upon publication than, while the former could be opened by the exercise of the discretionary power of the court, the latter would be beyond the reach of any such power. We do not think that it was the intention of the act to produce any such unreasonable result." The rule that such a decree may be vacated is sustained by the following authorities: Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393; Adams v. Adams, 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Boyd's Appeal, 38 Pa. 241; Zoellner v. Zoellner, 46 Mich. 511, 9 N. W. 831; Helmes v. Helmes, 24 Misc. 125, 52 N. Y. Supp. 734; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 29 App. Div. 331, 51 N. Y. Supp. 365; Elmgren v. Elmgren, 25 R. I. 177, 55 Atl. 322; Medina v. Medina, 22 Colo. 146, 43 Pac. 1001; Van Derveer v. Van Derveer, 30 Ohio L. J. 96; Womack v. Womack, 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136; Bishop, Marr. & Div. 1556; Stewart, Marr. & Div. § 422; and, in the opinion of the writer, by the case of Winstone v. Winstone, 40 Wash. 272, 82 Pac. 268, as well as the Metler and McDonald Cases.

It is contended, however, that, the lower court having had complete jurisdiction, a mere offer to prove that the decree was obtained as the result of perjured testimony, and was fraudulently obtained, is insufficient. Whatever the rule may be when the divorce proceeding is collaterally inquired into, it must be remembered that this is a direct application, timely and diligently prosecuted, and no harm can result to any innocent person by a further inquiry as to the justice of respondent's cause. Aside from these considerations, the interest of the public in all actions for divorce is such L.R.A.1917B.

that a policy has grown up, in accord with enlightened sentiment, to discourage and deny divorces unless claimed upon proper grounds and sustained by an honest disclosure of the facts. There is much in the record that prompts further inquiry. The complaint did not, as the statute (Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Stat. § 5730 [Pierce's Code, § 4641]) expressly provides, distinctly state the causes relied upon. Although the proceeding must have borne the earmarks of a divorce by consent or collusion, the prosecuting attorney was not called upon to inquire into the merits of the cause. It was, in effect, notwithstanding the record, a decree by default. The fact that respondent, as it now appears, had prompted the whole proceeding, including the employment of an attorney who was willing to accept the questionable agency of appearing for the defendant, through the intervention of the plaintiff, whose interest was hostile, was in itself, when promptly disavowed, a showing of fraud upon the law and upon the court, calling for further inquiry. The demurrer admits the conduct of respondent prior to and subsequent to the entry of the decree; and, while ordinarily the plea of coercion or duress would not be heard upon the facts alleged, when we consider the years of intimate relationship existing between these parties, the trust and confidence inspired by mutual interest in the rearing of children, it is not for us to say in this proceeding that appellant was not the victim of a well-founded dread that respondent, the father of her children, would take his life unless she submitted to his demand. His after declaration that he intended to marry another was enough to disabuse her mind, make the cowardice of his silly threat stand naked and revealed, and recall the fact that her rights had been taken from her without a hearing. It is not, as counsel says, an indication that she has allowed her "jealous and spiteful disposition to overcome her better judgment." In it we see the way of woman, and when it appears that she has been deprived of her right by pretense that prevented a full inquiry, the interest of the public, as well as that of the wife, intervenes and demands a rehearing upon the full merits of the cause. "Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his cause by fraud or deception practised on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise, . . . these and similar cases which show that there has never been a clear contest in the trial or hearing of the case, are reasons for which a new suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree and open the case for a new and a fair hearing." United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

The order of the lower court sustaining the demurrer to appellant's petition and dismissing her from the court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the lower court to entertain her petition for the vacation of the decree.

I. Previous notes pertinent to attacks on divorces.

There have heretofore been published in the Lawyers Reports Annotated sundry notes kindred to this annotation which profitably the reader may again peruse. Attention especially is here directed to the following:

I. The note to Butler v. Washington, 19 L.R.A. 814, on the validity of a decree of divorce obtained on publication or service out of the state, where the defendant did not appear.

II. The note to Merriman v. Walton, 30 L.R.A. 786, on injunctions against judgments obtained by fraud, accident, mistake, surprise, or duress.

III. The note to Tyler v. Aspinwall, 54 L.R.A. 758, on who may sue or take other proceedings to set aside judgments against other parties.

IV. The notes to Lawrence v. Nelson, 57 L.R.A. 583, and McElrath v. McElrath, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, on the right to contest the validity of a divorce decree after the death of one or both of the parties.

VII. The notes to Graves v. Graves, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216; South Haven & E. R. Co. v. Culver, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 564; Reeves v. Reeves, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 574; and Robertson v. Freebury, L.R.A.1916B, 883 et seq., on perjury as ground for relief against judgment.

VIII. The note to Rumping v. Rumping, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1197, on the necessity of alleging jurisdictional residence in divorce proceeding.

IX. The note to Flood v. Templeton, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 579, on relief from judgment suffered in reliance upon a promise which was not kept.

X. The note to Clark v. Southern Can Co. 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 980, on the character and kinds of judgments and orders within the rule that judgments and orders cannot be collaterally attacked for fraud not affecting the jurisdiction.

XI. The note to Atkinson v. Atkinson, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 499, on delay in procuring order for publication of summons after making affidavit.

II. The finality of judgments of divorce.

There are no maxims of the law more firmly established or of more value in the administration of justice than "Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium," and "Nemo bis vexari pro una et eadem causa,"—the two which are designed to prevent repeated litigation between the same parties in regard to the same subject of controversy. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

The same verity attaches to a decree of divorce granted by a competent court that guards the sanctity of judgments of superior courts having jurisdiction of their subjects and the parties. Whitford v. Whitford (1911) 100 Ark. 63, 139 S. W. 653.

When a decree of divorce rendered by a superior court of general jurisdiction which had jurisdiction of the parties is attacked, every reasonable presumption will be indulged in favor of its validity. Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706.

A divorce granted by a court clothed by statute with general jurisdiction over the subject is presumed, under an attack by a subsequent spouse of the person divorced, to be valid, notwithstanding the silence of the record respecting the existence of the jurisdictional fact of residence. Werz v. Werz (1881) 11 Mo. App. 26.

A party who, without fault or neglect, has had an unjust or unauthorized judgment rendered against him through the fraud of his adversary, can treat it as invalid only after he has, in some mode prescribed by law, had it reversed or annulled. Davis v. Davis (1873) 61 Me. 395.

One cannot have a judgment against him set aside without showing that he was unable, for some good reason sufficient to excuse his failure, to make a defense against the action. Clark v. Ramsey (1915) 143 Ga. 729, 85 S. E. 869.

Unless there is some special and recognized cause for the interference of a court of equity with the judgment of a court of law or the decree of a court of probate, such judgment will remain a positive bar to future litigation at law or in equity. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

A decree of divorce between a husband and wife legally domiciled in the state where it was granted, rendered in conformity with the laws of such state, when there is a statute providing for service of process by publication in such cases, is not invalid because the defendant was not served personally with process, and did not appear and submit to the jurisdiction of the court in the suit. Harrison v. Harrison (1851) 19 Ala. 499.

In a suit for a divorce, an earlier decree of divorce obtained by the defendant against the plaintiff, and pleaded in bar, cannot be attacked and annulled on the ground that it was procured by fraud and duress, when the court had full jurisdiction of both the subject and the parties. De Graw v. De Graw (1879) 7 Mo. App. 121.

An application of a husband to open an interlocutory decree of divorce obtained by his wife upon clearly proven grounds, and to be allowed to defend, without offering adequate excuse for not appearing and defending in time, is properly denied where there has been no collusion, no imposition on the court, and no other reason appears why the court, in the public interest, should direct or allow any further inquiry. Gabriel v. Gabriel (1916) — N. J. Eq. —, 97 Atl. 495.

The petition of a husband who was regularly served with process in his wife's suit for divorce, and deliberately suffered a default therein, presented after her death, and obviously in order to obtain a share of her estate, merely alleging the falsity of her charges and of the testimony in support of them, and offering no excuse for his failure to defend, should be denied and dismissed. Roberts v. Roberts (1896) 19 R. I. 349.

A man sued for divorce by his wife, duly cited and charged with cruelty, who enters no appearance, and, knowing the time and place of hearing, absents himself from the taking of depositions, and who employs counsel who confers with his wife's counsel while the suit is pending, cannot, after a decree has been granted and alimony awarded to his wife, upon a motion unsupported by any excuse for his default, have the judgment set aside and the cause restored for trial on the merits, upon allegations that the decree was procured by testimony known to his wife to be false, and which amounted to a fraud upon the court. L.R.A.1917B.

A man who knew his wife had begun a suit for divorce from him, and who was personally served with a citation, fully explained to him, issued on her original petition, and who knew within three weeks afterwards, and in time to appeal, that a decree had been rendered against him, cannot maintain suit to set aside a decree granted upon an amended petition of which he had no notice, but which set up no new ground of action. Richards v. Minster (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 70 S. W. 98.

A defendant regularly served with process in a divorce suit, and having knowledge of its pendency, cannot complain of a decree rendered against him by default, on the ground that he was not specially notified to appear at the trial on the merits. O'Brien v. D'Hemecourt (1907) 118 La. 996, 43 So. 654.

When a husband has obtained a decree of divorce from his wife upon the ground that she had, at the time of the marriage, and concealed it from him, an incurable physical disease which made her incapable of child-bearing, in a suit brought while the couple were living apart in voluntary separation, of which she had personal notice in ample time and due form to appear and defend, and which she allowed to go to judgment against her by default, an attack afterwards made by her on the decree in so far only as it omitted to make any provision for alimony for her must fail upon its appearing that, while the action was pending, she had written a letter to her husband's attorney, releasing any claims for alimony that she might have, notwithstanding her allegation that such letter was not her voluntary act, in the absence of any sufficient or credible proof of any duress. Rouse v. Rouse (1877) 47 Iowa, 422.

As to whether or not a final decree of divorce granted by a court of competent jurisdiction over the subject matter, between parties domiciled in the commonwealth, after the respondent had appeared and defended, or had been duly summoned and was legally in default, was open to any reversal by review, writ of error, certiorari, or other proceeding in the nature of an appeal, the Massachusetts supreme judicial court declined, in Greene v. Greene (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 361, 61 Am. Dec. 468, to express any opinion, and contented itself with deciding that such a decree, on the principle of res judicata, was conclusive in a subsequent litigation between the parties, even when it was attacked upon the ground that it was procured by means of false witnesses suborned to commit perjury by the spouse who obtained it.

The case of Greene v. Greene (Mass.) supra, was reviewed and limited afterwards in Edson v. Edson (1867) 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393. In the later case it was said of the former that some of the general expressions used in it by the court, when disconnected from the facts there involved, have been thought to sanction the doctrine that a divorce once obtained could not be impeached in any proceeding or set aside by a party to the original suit, however fraudulent and collusive may have been the other party's conduct in procuring it. But, it was added, such a conclusion is not a fair and legitimate result of the language and reasoning of the court when considered, as it ought to be, solely with reference to the actual case before the court for adjudication. The attempt there was upon a new libel for divorce to try over again a case which had before been adjudicated between the same parties after due notice and opportunity for a full hearing on the merits. Strictly speaking, the decision is an authority only for the proposition that a decree of divorce cannot be called in question or invalidated on the ground of fraud in its procurement in a separate and independent libel subsequently brought between the same parties when it appears that the first decree was entered after due notice to the adverse party, followed by an adjudication upon evidence offered in support of the allegations in the libel. To this extent there can be no doubt that the decision is in harmony with sound principle and with adjudicated cases. But, beyond this, which was the precise point adjudicated, the authority of the case cannot be properly extended.

III. Relation of nature of the marriage contract and public interest in divorces toward attacks on decrees.

There are considerations which profoundly influence the decisions of the courts in suits and proceedings attacking decrees of divorce which have no place in other litigations to set aside judgments. These arise out of the nature of the marriage contract and the interest of the state in its stability.

A judgment dissolving a marriage contract differs essentially in its effects from judgments determining property rights, because marriage contracts are fundamentally different from all other contracts. Marriage, viewed solely as a civil relation, does possess elements of contract. Andrews v. Andrews (1902) 188 U. S. 14, 47 L. ed. 366, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237.

It is often termed a civil contract by textbook authors and in court decisions, but it is very much more than a mere contract, for, while other contracts may be modified, restricted, enlarged, or entirely abrogated by the consent of the contractors, the law steps in and holds those who make a marriage contract to divers obligations and liabilities, and its dissolution is always subject to legislative control. Maynard v. Hill (1888) 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 723.

Although marriage is in a sense a contract, because it is both stipulatory and consensual, not valid without the spontaneous concurrence of two competent minds, it is nevertheless sui generis, and, unlike ordinary or commercial contracts, is publici juris because it creates fundamental and important domestic relations. Maguire v. Maguire (1838) 7 Dana (Ky.) 181.

As every well-organized society is deeply interested in the existence, harmony, and decorum of all its social relations, marriage, the most elementary and useful of them all, is regulated and controlled by the sovereign power of the state, and cannot, like mere contracts, be abrogated or dissolved by the mutual consent alone of the contracting persons, but only by the sovereign, when the public interest requires it, and in furtherance of justice. Maguire v. Maguire (Ky.) supra.

The causes for which a marriage contract may be broken are limited to such as the government deems incompatible with its continuance for the welfare of the parties and society. True v. True (1861) 6 Minn. 458, Gil. 315.

The community and the state have a vital interest in the sanctity of the marriage compact, and have confided its keeping to the courts alone. True v. True (Minn.) supra.

The institution of marriage has been judicially declared to be an important feature of civilization, the preservation of which is essential to the maintenance of organized society. Grannis v. Superior Ct. (1905) 146 Cal. 245, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23, 79 Pac. 891.

In every civilized country, it has been said, marriage is recognized as the most important relation in life, and one in which the state is vitally interested. It is a well-recognized public policy to foster and protect marriage, to make it a public institution, to encourage spouses to live together, to prevent their separation, and to discourage illicit unions. Deyoe v. Superior Ct. (1903) 140 Cal. 482, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73, 74 Pac. 28.

It has been aptly said that the sanctity of the marriage relation is so essential to the stability of our social and moral institutions, and is so necessary to the preservation of the home,—the essential unit of government and modern civilization,—that no technical rules as to judicial procedure should be allowed to interfere with its protection by the courts of the country, but it should be the aim and desire of every court to give the law that liberal interpretation that will tend to build a fortress about the marriage institution. Dickinson v. Dickinson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 205.

The public has an interest in the result of every suit for divorce. McBlain v. McBlain (1888) 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61; Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531.

A bill for a divorce partakes of the nature of a suit in chancery, and, to a great extent, is governed by chancery rules. Bowman v. Bowman (1872) 64 Ill. 75.

The courts aim to afford the fullest possible hearing of divorce suits. McBlain v. McBlain and Cottrell v. Cottrell (Cal.) supra.

Although a suit to dissolve a marriage is nominally between two individuals, the state, because of its interest in maintaining the marital relation unless good cause for its dissolution exists, is an interested party. Deyoe v. Superior Ct. (Cal.) supra.

A divorce suit is a litigation of public interest in which the litigants can waive nothing essential to the validity of the proceedings, and must observe all statutory requirements. Whitford v. Whitford (1911) 100 Ark. 63, 139 S. W. 653.

The public, having an interest in marriages and divorces, will not sustain contracts designed to uphold illegal or fraudulent divorces. Comstock v. Adams (1880) 23 Kan. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 191.

In divorce suits, which often are uncontested, and where collusion may exist, the public has a peculiar interest, which is in the care of the courts, which will be astute to enforce the principles and policies of the law, lest, by the suppression or perversion of important facts, they may be used to allow decrees to which neither litigant is justly or legally entitled. Fisher v. Fisher (1902) 95 L.R.A.1917B.

Md. 319, 93 Am. St. Rep. 334, 52 Atl. 898; Foxwell v. Foxwell (1914) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494.

A judgment of divorce is peculiar in that it establishes the personal status of the parties to it in a particular which is of the highest importance to them and to the community. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

IV. Vulnerability of judgments and decrees of divorce.

Notwithstanding the general finality of judgments, any judgment may be set aside if good grounds exist, in an appropriate proceeding seasonably instituted for the purpose. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93; Vance v. Burbank (1880) 101 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 929; Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134; Noble v. Moses Bros. (1883) 74 Ala. 604; McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Evans v. Wilhite (1912) 176 Ala. 287, 58 So. 262; McAdams v. Windham (1915) 191 Ala. 287, 68 So. 51; Wells, F. & Co. v. W. B. Baker Lumber Co. (1913) 107 Ark. 415, 155 S. W. 122; Malone v. Big Flat Gravel Min. Co. (1892) 93 Cal. 384, 28 Pac. 1063; Clark v. Oyharzabal (1900) 129 Cal. 328, 61 Pac. 1119; Flood v. Templeton (1907) 152 Cal. 148, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 579, 92 Pac. 78; Davis v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462; Pearce v. Olney (1850) 20 Conn. 544; Moore v. Moore (1913) 139 Ga. 597, 77 S. E. 820; Wierich v. De Zoya (1845) 7 Ill. 385; French v. Thomas (1911) 252 Ill. 65, 96 N. E. 564; Stodgell v. Garnett (1910) 159 Ill. App. 301; Woodruff Place v. Gorman (1912) 179 Ind. 1, 100 N. E. 71; Gorman v. Johnson (1910) 46 Ind. App. 672, 91 N. E. 971; Griffith v. Merchant's Life Assn. (1910) 148 Iowa, 727, 127 N. W. 1079; Frisbie v. Chase (1913) 161 Iowa, 133, 140 N. W. 842; *Lawrence v. Ch. 396; Barr v. Packard Motor Car Co. (1912) 172 Mich. 299, 137 N. W. 697; Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310; Hinkle v. Lovelace (1907) 204 Mo. 208, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730, 120 Am. St. Rep. 698, 102 S. W. 1015, 11 Ann. Cas. 794; Einstein v. Strother (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 122; Loeb v. Schmith (1868) 1 Mont. 87; Tebbetts v. Tilton (1855) 31 N. H. 287;

Binsse v. Barker (1832) 13 N. J. L. 263, 23 Am. Dec. 720; Boyd v. Williams (1903) 70 N. J. L. 185, 56 Atl. 135; Corning v. Tripp (1844) 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 14; Williams v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 110 N. C. 466, 15 S. E. 97; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Reese (1910) 26 Okla. 613, 110 Pac. 1071; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Eastham (1910) 26 Okla. 605, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 110 Pac. 887; Brown v. Trent (1912) 36 Okla. 239, 128 Pac. 895; Johnson v. Filtsch (1913) 37 Okla. 510, 138 Pac. 165; Bowman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity will always be exercised to nullify a judgment upon grounds rendering it against conscience to enforce it. Pearce v. Olney (1850) 20 Conn. 544.

A court of equity will grant relief against a judgment contrary to conscience, obtained in any way by which injustice has been done. Moore v. Gamble (1852) 9 N. J. Eq. 246.

A decree of divorce constitutes no exception. Daniels v. Benedict (1892) 50 Fed. 347; Golden v. Golden (1893) 102 Ala. 353, 14 So. 638; Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706; Womaek v. Womaek (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136; Stewart v. Stewart (1911) 101 Ark. 86, 141 S. W. 193; *Elliott v. Decrees of divorce are generally treated like judgments in ordinary civil actions in suits to set them aside, except for a justifiable reluctance to annul them, manifested by the courts, after second marriages on the faith of them have been contracted. Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341.

There is no distinction between judgments of divorce and other judgments in respect of their impeachability for fraud in their procurement. Re Smith (1906) 74 Kan. 452, 87 Pac. 189.

So far as the general power of courts to set aside, vacate, modify, or amend their judgments in concerned, decrees of divorce stand upon the same footing as other judgments. Adams v. Adams (1871) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

The inherent power of all courts to vacate or modify their judgments in direct proceedings for the purpose, for good causes, extends now in Indiana to decrees of divorce, save only in so far as it is restricted specifically by statute. Nicholson v. Nicholson (1888) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223.

In general, divorce decrees are open to attack in the same manner and upon the same grounds as other judgments. Barber v. Barber (1916) — Me. —, 98 Atl. 822.

Attacks on decrees of divorce rest on the same bases as those upon judgments in other cases. Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

In respect of remedies to set it aside, a decree of divorce does not differ from any other judgment determining the property or personal rights of the person against whom it has been rendered. State ex rel. Happel v. District Ct.

(1909) 38 Mont. 166, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1098, 129 Am. St. Rep. 636, 99 Pac. 291.

Judgments of divorce are open to attack in the same manner, upon the same grounds, and within the same periods of time, as other judgments. Nichells v. Nichells (1895) 5 N. D. 125, 33 L.R.A. 515, 57 Am. St. Rep. 540, 64 N. W. 73.

A decree in a divorce suit is within the operation of the rule that whenever a judgment has been obtained by the fraud of the person in whose favor it was rendered, without implicating the adverse party, there is a good and sufficient cause for vacating that judgment. State v. Watson (1898) 20 R. I. 354, 78 Am. St. Rep. 871, 39 Atl. 193, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 24, affirmed in (1900) 179 U. S. 679, 45 L. ed. 383, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 915.

There is, upon principle, according to the supreme court of Maine, no solid ground for any distinction in respect of impeaching judgments for fraud between decrees in divorce suits and other judgments; or, if there be any distinction, it is to be found in the much greater danger of fraud and imposition in divorce cases as compared with others, and the added necessity and importance of preserving the power to correct or vacate decrees fraudulently obtained. Adams v. Adams (1871) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

In the esteem of the court of appeals of Kentucky neither reason nor policy demands that judgments of divorce should be outside the general law applying to grants of new trials, and in that commonwealth there is a special reason why courts having jurisdiction in such cases should have every possible means of preventing frauds and correcting an error or injustice in a judgment of divorce because no appeal lies from it; and unless the court that committed the wrong can right it, the injured party has no redress. Meyar v. Meyar (1860) 3 Met. (Ky.) 298.

V. Judicial power to set aside divorces.

The power to set aside judgments in original suits and proceedings is ordinarily exercised subject to restrictions imposed by general rules of law and equity or statutes, by courts of equity, or those clothed with equitable jurisdiction. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134; Renfro v. Merryman (1881) 71 Ala. 195; McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Evans v. Wilhite (1910) 167 Ala. 587, 52 So. 845; McAdams v. Windham (1915) 191 Ala. L.R.A.1917B.

A petition to set aside a judgment is addressed to the equity powers of the court. Patrucio v. Selkirk (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 635.

The district courts of Texas are held to have the power of courts of equity to relieve from judgments obtained by fraud, accident, or mistake. McMurray v. McMurray (1887) 67 Tex. 665, 4 S. W. 357.

One district court in Nebraska has been held to have no jurisdiction to set aside a decree of divorce granted by another district court of equal rank, on the ground that the assailed decree was obtained by means of perjury and fraud. Smithson v. Smithson (1893) 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300.

A court of equity will afford relief against a judgment at law on grounds which were not available at law to the defeated litigant. Kent v. Ricards (1850) 3 Md. Ch. 396.

Or when the justice of the judgment is impeached by facts. Ibid.

Since courts of law in New York have been authorized to refer disputed facts to a referee for report on motions for relief, it is not necessary for one who seeks to set aside a judgment got by fraud to resort in ordinary cases to a court of equity, because the law courts are as capable of passing on controverted facts as is a judge sitting in chancery. Denton v. Denton (1871) 41 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 221.

The power of setting judgments aside in proceedings instituted for the purpose is also exercised under like restrictions by the courts in which the judgments were obtained.

The supreme court of Maine has said that it could see no good reason why a court might not vacate a decree of divorce during the same term, of its own motion. The power to vacate such a decree should be exercised if justice requires, whether there is a motion or not; and, it added, we do not doubt that the court has such power. Barber v. Barber (1916) — Me. —, 98 Atl. 822.

It has several times been declared that, as a general thing, every superior court possesses inherent power to set aside or modify its own judgments, decrees of divorce included, for good and sufficient causes, in furtherance of justice. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Wood v. Wesley (1912) 75 Misc. 521, 135 N. Y. Supp. 876, affirmed in (1912) 151 App. Div. 897, 135 N. Y. Supp. 1150; Mendola v. Illinois Surety Co. (1912) 141 N. Y. L.R.A. 1917B.

Despite the doctrines of Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482, it has been asserted in Ohio, in an attack upon a divorce, that the courts of the state have inherent power to protect themselves and the public from fraud and perjury. Mulligan v. Mulligan (1908) 11 Ohio C. C. N. S. 585, 31 Ohio C. C. 89.

The inherent power of all courts to vacate or modify their judgments for good cause, in a direct proceeding, was said, in Nicholson v. Nicholson (1887) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223, to be too firmly settled, both on principle and by authority, to justify further discussion.

They have this power as a part of their necessary machinery for the due administration of justice. State v. Watson (1898) 20 E. I. 354, 78 Am. St. Rep. 871, 39 Atl. 193, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 24, affirmed in (1900) 179 U. S. 679, 45 L. ed. 383, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 915.

A decree of divorce obtained by fraud may be set aside by the court which granted it upon a summary application, seasonably made. Olmstead v. Olmstead (1889) 41 Minn. 297, 43 N. W. 67.

A court which granted a decree of divorce has inherent power to vacate it upon a motion made in apt time, grounded upon a fraud or imposition upon it by the plaintiff. Scribner v. Scribner (1904) 93 Minn. 195, 101 N. W. 163.

A court of general jurisdiction possesses not less in divorce than in other cases, ex necessitate and independent of statute, power to rid itself of the effects of a deceit practised upon it, and to expunge from its records what has been spread upon them only through deception and fraud. Yorke v. Yorke (1893) 3 N. D. 343, 55 N. W. 1095.

Every court of record, unless restrained by positive enactment, has the power to vacate its judgments when it is established that they were obtained by fraud. Denton v. Denton (1871) 41 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 221.

A superior court may always exercise the power to amend or correct the record of one of its own judgments so as to make that record speak the truth, —show what really was the judicial action. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

No statute prohibiting, a court which granted a divorce upon a service by publication has the power and right, for good cause shown, and on a proper application by the defendant, to set the judgment aside and allow a defense to be made. R— v. R— (1866) 20 Wis. 331.

It is generally agreed that every court of general jurisdiction has power inherently and virtually, at its discretion, of its own motion, or upon application of either litigant, in a proper case, for good cause and upon due notice, of course, to the parties in interest, to alter, modify, open, or set aside any judgment, decree, or order that it had rendered or made, not excepting a decree of divorce, at any time during and before the end of the same term. Wells, F. & Co. v. W. B. Baker Lumber Co. (1913) 107 Ark. 415, 155 S. W. 122; Tyler v. Aspinwall (Conn.) supra; Moore v. Moore (1913) 139 Ga. 597, 77 S. E. 820; *Danforth v. Every proceeding in court is in fieri until the close of the term; hence, the court has full and complete control over its record of proceedings during the entire term at which they are had, and may at any time while the term lasts, for good cause shown, correct, modify, or vacate any judgment it has rendered. Foote v. Foote (1913) 53 Ind. App. 673, 102 N. E. 393.

It is said to be "undoubted law that the power of a court over its judgments during the entire term at which they are rendered is unlimited." The court has full power to amend, correct, or vacate a decree or judgment. During the term the judgment is still in fieri, and subject to the further action of the court. Bar- ber v. Barber (1916) — Me. —, 98 Atl. 822.

The power of a court of record to vacate or modify its own judgment or decree at the same term in which it was rendered is inherent. It does not depend upon, but is independent of, statutes. Wells, F. & Co. v. W. B. Baker Lumber Co. (1913) 107 Ark. 415, 155 S. W. 122.

The power of a court to set aside or change its own judgment during the term at which it rendered it is not lost by continuing a timely motion to vacate beyond the term. Parks v. Haynes (1915) — Okla. —, 152 Pac. 400.

In Iowa it has been provided by statute (Code, § 243) that the record of proceedings in court remains under the control of the court, and may be amended or any entry in it may be expunged at any time during the term at which it is made and before its final attestation by the judge's signature; but the statute only declares the common law, since the supreme court of the state has said, after citing it: "Even without such a statute . . . the court has undoubted inherent power to correct its own records during the term, and to set aside, modify, or expunge any order, decree, or judgment theretofore ordered at the same term, and the power exists until adjournment sine die." Todhunter v. De Graff (1914) 164 Iowa, 567, 146 N. W. 66.

The Kentucky Statute (Civ. Code, § 426) which restricts the power of the court which has granted a decree of divorce to set it aside to cases where both parties unite in asking annulment does not affect the right and power of the court to vacate the decree at the same term, provided neither party has remarried. Droste v. Droste (1910) 138 Ky. 53, 127 S. W. 506.

During the term at which a decree of divorce has been rendered, and as long as the condition of both parties remains unchanged, it may, upon due notice to the opposing party, be set aside upon the application of the other, by the court which rendered it. Ficener v. Ficener (1887) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 867, 3 S. W. 597.

It was objected in Barber v. Barber (Me.) supra, that a court which had granted a decree of divorce and then vacated it at the same term, upon its own motion, could not rightfully do so without notice to the spouse who obtained the decree; but, as to this, the supreme court said: We are not persuaded that this view is the correct one. The justice had heard the case. His first decision and decree favorable to the libellant gave her no fixed right. It was subject to change during the term. During the term it was ambulatory. The order vacating the decree left the case pending on the docket. The libellant was deprived of no right. She might have asked for and had another hearing on the libel. Under such circumstances we do not think notice to show cause was necessary as a matter of law.

On the other hand, it has been held that a court has not the right, upon its own motion, to vacate a decree of divorce granted by it during the term at which it was granted, except upon a showing of some legal ground for such action, and after notice to the spouse who obtained it, and an opportunity to be heard in opposition. Morris v. Morris (1894) 60 Mo. App. 86.

After a decree of divorce, made at the end of a trial, has been settled in terms, signed by the trial judge, and spread upon the record as the judgment of the court, a change in its provisions intended to affect the title to and ownership of real estate held by the parties in common, made on the ex parte application of one party without notice to the other, even before the end of the term, and by the same judge, is void and may be successfully attacked and annulled by the party whose rights were infringed in an action to partition quiet title to, or recover the possession or value of the property affected by the change in the decree. Kiventsky v. Sirovy (1909) 142 Iowa, 384, 121 N. W. 27.

The defendant in a divorce suit who was served by publication only, and who did not appear therein, need not be cited when the court, of its own motion, at the same term, proceeds, upon notice to the plaintiff, to set aside a decree previously granted, upon the ground that the court was imposed upon by false testimony. Todhunter v. De Graff (1914) 164 Iowa, 567, 146 N. W. 66.

The courts in the different jurisdictions are not in accord as to whether or not a court of record has power to vacate or set aside a judgment after the term at which it was rendered has expired; and those which grant the power differ in different jurisdictions upon the conditions, circumstances, and limitations affecting its exercise. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

It has been held that the inherent power and right of a court to set aside one of its own judgments does not outlast the term at which the judgment was rendered. Ewart v. Peniston (1911) 233 Mo. 695, 136 S. W. 422.

The power of a court to vacate or modify its own judgment at or after the term does not extend to setting aside a final judgment after the term at which it was rendered, for alleged errors of law properly to be considered on a motion for a new trial, made during the term. Clark v. Roman (1915) — Okla. —, 151 Pac. 479.

After the term at which a decree of divorce was granted has expired, the court which granted the decree has no right or power to change, on notice and motion, the provisions thereof respecting alimony and a division of property, on the ground that they are different from what he supposed and actually intended them to be, where the statute in virtue of which the court assumed to make the change in the decree merely provided for vacating or modifying it for a mistake, negligence, or omission of the clerk, or an irregularity in obtaining the judgment. Hatfield v. Hatfield (1916) — Okla. —, 158 Pac. 942.

The grounds that justify setting aside ordinary judgments at law or in equity after the terms expire during which they were rendered have been held not to apply to decrees of divorce, which are final. Ficener v. Ficener (1887) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 867, 3 S. W. 597.

Again, it has been held that a court of general jurisdiction from which a decree of divorce was obtained by a fraud has the power to set it aside at a later term. Allen v. Maclellan (1849) 12 Pa. 328, 51 Am. Dec. 608.

And it has been declared that such a court, independently of an express statute, has power to set aside a decree of divorce fraudulently procured after the term at which it was granted has ended. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

As the record of a judgment is a history of the court proceedings, the power to make it truthful is a necessary one possessed by every court of record, and one which may be exercised during the term at which the judgment was rendered or afterwards, on the court's own motion or otherwise. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

Upon a petition addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the court, asking that a decree of divorce rendered at a former term be reopened and vacated, upon the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, the court has power to entertain the application and grant the prayed-for relief if the facts warrant it.

Edson v. Edson (1867) 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393.

A petition asking the court to exercise judicial discretion and open and vacate a decree of divorce rendered at a previous term, on the ground that it was procured by fraud, is, in its nature and effect, an application to correct the record and prevent injustice and wrong likely to result from the judgment if it should be left undisturbed. Ibid.

By a statute of Iowa (Code, § 4091) district courts were authorized to vacate or modify judgments, including decrees of divorce, or to grant new trials at subsequent terms, for certain stated causes. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

After terms have expired, judgments or orders obtained by fraud in district courts of Nebraska might by statute (Civ. Code, § 602), held to apply to divorce suits, be vacated or modified for errors in the proceedings against infants or lunatics, where the infancy or lunacy did not appear on the face of the record. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

A superior court in the state of Washington has been empowered by statute, which embraces divorces, to vacate or modify judgments after term time for frauds practised in obtaining them, and upon the petition of the injured party, whether served personally or constructively. Chaney v. Chaney (1909) 56 Wash. 145, 105 Pac. 229.

A remedy by motion to open a default and set aside a decree in a divorce suit is open in a proper case under the provision (§ 116) of the Code of Civil Procedure of Montana, empowering the court to grant relief to a party or his legal representatives from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Simpkins v. Simpkins (1894) 14 Mont. 386, 43 Am. St. Rep. 641, 36 Pac. 759.

Under a statute (Tex. Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 1375) which provides that in cases where judgment is rendered on service by publication, and the defendant has not appeared in person or by an attorney of her own selection, a new trial may be granted for good cause shown upon her application, supported by her affidavit, a wife petitioning to set aside a divorce granted her husband in a suit where service was by publication only, and in which she was represented only by an attorney appointed for the purpose by the court, need not allege either fraud in obtaining the decree or falsity in the affidavit to procure publication service. Bracht v. Bracht (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 107 S. W. 895.

A proceeding under the Texas statute (Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 1375) to set aside a judgment rendered upon service by publication only, against a defendant who did not appear either in person or by his own attorney, is not a new suit, but merely a continuation of the former one; and the order for a new trial is therefore an interlocutory one, and not reviewable by direct appeal. Wolf v. Sahm (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 120 S. W. 1114, rehearing denied in (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 572, 121 S. W. 561.

VI. Bill in equity to set aside a divorce as a bill of review.

A bill in equity to annul a judgment or a decree of divorce for fraud is commonly called an original bill in the nature of a bill of review. McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795; Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581; Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548.

But it is not strictly a bill of review. Tribble v. Patton (1913) 180 Ala. 258, 60 So. 863.

A bill of review aims to reverse, alter, or explain a judgment or decree in a former action or suit. Watkinson v. Watkinson (1905) 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 Ann. Cas. 326.

A bill in equity for a review must proceed upon an error of law apparent upon the face of the judgment or decree to be reviewed, or upon fraud in obtaining it, or upon matter either new or newly discovered which was not available to prevent the judgment or decree, and which, if it had been available might have prevented it. Ibid.; Kingman v. Kingman (1895) 61 Ill. App. 134.

And it is essential for maintaining a bill of review to set aside a decree of divorce that leave to file it be first had from the court. Kearns v. Kearns (1905) 70 N. J. Eq. 483, 65 Atl. 464; Leveridge v. Leveridge (1911) — N. J. Eq. —, 79 Atl. 422.

The granting or refusing of leave to file a bill of review rests in the sound discretion of the court, and its action, when there has been no abuse of discretion, is not subject to revision on appeal. Stockley v. Stockley (1892) 93 Mich. 307, 53 N. W. 523; Tisman v. Tisman (1913) 176 Mich. 94, 142 N. W. 358.

An application for leave to file a bill of review to set aside a decree of divorce alleged to have been obtained by a fraud which induced the applicant to refrain from defending the suit is addressed to the discretion of the court of chancery, and it should be denied when the evidence refutes the charge of fraud and shows affirmatively that the applicant had throughout full knowledge of the proceedings to obtain the divorce, and that the spouse who got it has since married another. Leveridge v. Leveridge (N. J.) supra.

An original bill in equity to set aside a decree of divorce for fraud in procuring it is not a bill of review in the ordinary sense and meaning of the term, and hence statutes forbidding bills of review to be allowed in divorce cases, or limiting the time within which they may be brought, do not apply. Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94, on second appeal (1914) 257 Mo. 317, 165 S. W. 783.

The rule which precludes filing a bill of review to set aside a decree of divorce after the statutory time to appeal from it has elapsed has no application to ex parte decrees obtained by fraud and imposition upon the court, the public, and the defrauded spouse. Jones v. Jones (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 558, 89 Atl. 29, and on second appeal (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 571, 91 Atl. 819.

A bill in equity to set aside a divorce, alleging that the defendant wilfully and knowingly misrepresented his own residence to confer jurisdiction, falsely charged the complainant with desertion, and fraudulently and falsely set up that the complainant was an absentee whose whereabouts were unascertainable, thus successfully preventing the complainant, who had a good defense, from appearing and defending, is a bill of review, and not an original bill to set aside the decree for fraud, and to make it good against a demurrer it is essential that leave of the court to file it be first obtained and then pleaded. Kearns v. Kearns (1905) 70 N. J. Eq. 483, 65 Atl. 464.

The power of the courts in Wisconsin to vacate judgments by bill of review for fraud or upon other than jurisdictional grounds is said to have been terminated by the enactment of the Wisconsin Code of Practice, so that, since its adoption, such relief has been obtainable only under and conformably to the statute (Stat. 1898, § 2832). Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447; Routledge v. Patterson (1911) 146 Wis. 226, 131 N. W. 346.

VII. Rules restrictive of equitable relief from divorces.

a. In general.

The rules under which litigants are allowed to seek relief in chancery against the judgments of other courts are very strict and inflexible, since, were they otherwise, the jurisdiction of courts of equity would soon supplant that of all other tribunals. Watts v. Gayle (1852) 20 Ala. 825; De Soto Coal, Min. & Development Co. v. Hill (1914) 188 Ala. 667, 65 So. 988; McAdams v. Windham (1915) 191 Ala. 287, 68 So. 51.

The peace and interests of society require the power to disturb the decrees and judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction, and to reopen controversies which it is the policy of the law to quiet, to be exercised with strictness and caution. Waldrom v. Waldrom (1884) 76 Ala. 285.

The equity powers of a court to give relief against a judgment will only be exercised to protect or enforce a substantial right without which the result would be contrary to good conscience. Van Buren v. Posteraro (1909) 45 Colo. 588, 132 Am. St. Rep. 199, 102 Pac. 1067.

A judgment will not be disturbed by a court of equity merely because it was unjust. Cantwell v. Kimmerle (1913) 179 Ill. App. 66.

Or merely because the court, had it decided the cause itself, would have come to a different conclusion. Ibid.

A court of chancery will not take jurisdiction of a bill to declare null a decree of divorce simply because it is void on its face. Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706.

The reason is that a void decree is already a nullity "under all circumstances and for all time." Martin v. Martin (1911) 173 Ala. 106, 55 So. 632.

b. Where a remedy at law for relief from a divorce exists.

1. The rule.

A court of equity usually refuses to entertain a bill for relief against a judgment when the plaintiff has open a complete and adequate remedy at law. Kidwell v. Masterson (1826) 3 Cranch, C. C. 52, Fed. Cas. No. 7,758; Furnald v. Glenn (1893) 56 Fed. 372; Hanson v. Ralston (1912) 168 Ill. App. 163; Schilling v. Quinn (1912) 178 Ind. 443, 99 N. E. 740; Chalmers v. Haek (1841) 19 Mo. 124; Johnston v. Paul (1876) 23 Minn. 46; Wieland v. Shillock (1876) 23 Minn. 227; Bicknell v. Field (1840) 8 Paige (N. Y.) 440; Evans v. Taylor (1886) 28 W. Va. 184.

A judgment or decree procured by fraud is open to attack in equity only when there is no means at law of obtaining adequate relief from it. Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270.

Where there is a complete and adequate remedy at law to one against whom a judgment was had by means of a conspiracy and perjury in a motion for a new trial, a bill in equity to set aside or restrain the enforcement of the judgment will not lie. Standard Fashion Co. v. Thompson (1910) 137 App. Div. 588, 122 N. Y. Supp. 300.

One who complains in equity of a judgment, and who had an adequate remedy at law for his grievance by an appeal which he took and abandoned, or suffered to be dismissed for failure to prosecute it, is entitled to no relief. Miller v. Owens (1913) 55 Colo. 88, 133 Pac. 141.

The neglect of a party to a divorce suit to appeal from an order denying an application to continue the trial beyond the term, when a statute gives the right to appeal, requires the denial of a motion, made after the time to appeal has expired, to vacate the decree, upon the same facts and grounds urged in support of the application to continue. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576.

An action to set aside a judgment of divorce is not maintainable by one against whom it was rendered, and who had previously moved to vacate it, and had the motion denied, because the remedy by appeal from the denial of the motion had not been exhausted and was an adequate one. McCord v. McCord (1901) 24 Wash. 529, 64 Pac. 748; Winstone v. Winstone (1905) 40 Wash. 272, 82 Pac. 268.

If a statute gives a complete and adequate remedy to vacate or modify a judgment for fraud or mistake in its procurement by a proceeding instituted for the purpose in the court which rendered it, a bill in equity to obtain the same relief will not lie. Dale v. Bland (1910) 93 Ark. 286, 124 S. W. 1026.

If one who seeks relief against a judgment has an adequate and specific remedy by statute by a motion to vacate it or an appeal from it, of which he has not availed himself nor has been deprived, a court of equity will not entertain his suit. Bilby v. Stuart (1913) 39 Okla. 451, 135 Pac. 931.

2. The exceptions.

Although a remedy to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by fraud may in many cases exist at law or have been provided by statute, yet if, in a given case, it is unavailable, inapplicable, or inadequate, and the right to relief exists, a court of equity may give appropriate relief. Smithson v. Smithson (1893) 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300.

Independent of remedies conferred by statutes, not exclusive in terms, a suit in equity lies for relief against an unjust judgment. Wolf v. Sahn (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 120 S. W. 1114, rehearing denied (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 572, 121 S. W. 561.

A remedy provided by statute, but not made exclusive, giving relief by motion to set aside a judgment of a court of law on the ground of surprise, accident, mistake, or fraud, is co-ordinate and cumulative with the remedy by bill in equity. Renfro Bros. v. Merryman (1881) 71 Ala. 195.

In attacking a judgment for fraud, the statutory remedy is cumulative, not exclusive. Michael v. American Nat. Bank (1911) 84 Ohio St. 370, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 220, 95 N. E. 905.

A statute or statutes prescribing remedies and regulating the practice when judgments are sought to be opened or set aside do not take away remedies in cases not specifically covered by their terms, unless they expressly say so; but leave them to be pursued according to the practice of courts of law and equity prevalent before their enactment. Smithson v. Smithson (1893) 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300.

Statutes prescribing grounds and procedure for obtaining new trials, not exclusive in terms, do not, as a rule, impair the inherent power of courts over their own judgments during the terms at which they are rendered. Richardson v. Howard (1915) — Okla. —, 151 Pac. 887.

The power of a court of equity to set aside a judgment of divorce procured by fraud is not restricted by a statute allowing a new trial to be granted within one year after entry of a fraudulent judgment, where the fraud remained undiscovered for that time, and could not have been discovered within it by any reasonable diligence. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

The mere fact that a statute gives a party defeated in an action at law a right, for a limited time, to apply to the court which rendered judgment against him, to open or set aside such judgment, or to grant a new trial, does not, where the statutory remedy is not expressly made exclusive, bar a complainant in a suit in equity to annul a judgment obtained by a fraud practised upon him by his adversary, on any theory that his remedy at law was adequate. Evans v. Wilhite (1910) 167 Ala. 587, 52 So. 845, on second appeal (1912) 176 Ala. 287, 58 So. 262.

A petition to set aside a divorce for fraud in obtaining it, while the usual method of proceeding in Pennsylvania, is not the exclusive remedy. Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100.

The Iowa statute (Code, § 4091) providing for a new trial upon petition within one year where a final judgment was procured by fraud does not give an exclusive remedy so as to deprive a court of equity of its jurisdiction to grant new trials where fraud was practised to obtain judgment, and the fraud was not discovered before a year had passed. Tollefson v. Tollefson (1908) 137 Iowa, 151, 114 N. W. 631.

A provision of the New York Code (§ 135, subdiv. 5) made it mandatory upon the court to allow a defendant against whom publication had been ordered, or his representatives, upon an application showing sufficient cause, made any time before judgment, to defend the action, and, provided further, that, except in an action for divorce, he or they might be allowed to come in and defend after judgment, within a year after notice and within seven years after it was rendered, on such terms as might be just. The general term of the supreme court construed the exception as depriving the court of power to open a decree of divorce and allow the defendant to defend where service had been made by publication, but, on appeal from this decision, the court of appeals held this view an erroneous one, and said that the statute was meant to enlarge the power of the courts in other than divorce cases, and not to curtail in any respect the power inherent in courts over their own decrees in divorce suits, as it existed before the Code was enacted. Brown v. Brown (1874) 58 N. Y. 609, reversing (1874) 1 Hun, 443.

c. Where the seeker of relief from a divorce has been at fault or negligent.

of equity when that aid was made necessary by his own fault. Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365.

He who seeks to set aside a judgment taken against him on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, duress, accident, mistake, or surprise is bound, as a condition of obtaining relief, to show that it was not suffered by his own fault or negligence. Duckworth v. Duckworth (1859) 35 Ala. 70; Weems v. Weems (1882) 73 Ala. 462; Waldrom v. Waldrom (1884) 76 Ala. 285; Foshee v. McCreary (1898) 123 Ala. 493, 26 So. 309; *Evans v. When fraud, accident, mistake, or surprise is a ground for equitable relief against a judgment, the complainant must enter court with a cause of action unmixed with his own fault or negligence. Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365.

To invoke successfully the interposition of a court of equity against a judgment or decree of another court, it is not enough that a wrong has been done, but it must be manifest that the wrong occurred by accident, surprise, fraud, or acts of the opposite party without fault or neglect of the wronged party. Waldrom v. Waldrom (1884) 76 Ala. 285.

A concurrence of injustice committed and of the complaining litigant's freedom from fault or negligence is an indispensable condition to the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of equity to set aside or annul a judgment or decree of another court. Ibid.

It is a well-settled doctrine that a court of equity will not interfere with the judgment of a court of law or the decree of a court of probate, detract from its conclusiveness, or reopen the litigation involved in its rendition, unless on facts or grounds of which the party complaining could not have availed himself when the decree or judgment was rendered because of accident or the fraud or act of his adversary, unmixed with fault or negligence on his own part. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

To have a judgment set aside in a suit brought for the purpose, grounded on a fraud which prevented a defense when there was a meritorious one, the complainant must allege and prove that the wrong, through no lack of diligence, was not discovered during the term at which the decree was granted. McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

A wife alleging fraud by her husband in obtaining a divorce from her in a suit brought in her home county, of which she had due notice, is bound to show, before the decree will be set aside, that she was without fault or negligence, and not lacking in diligence, when it was granted. Sperry v. Sperry (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 419.

A defendant in a divorce suit who, after entering a general appearance, neglected for three months to employ counsel within the state and convenient to the place of trial, to represent her at the trial, and then, toward the end of the term, applied on the ground of unpreparedness for, and was refused, a continuance, has not been sufficiently diligent to be entitled to relief from the decree granted at the trial. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576.

As in other cases, a court of equity will grant no relief from a judgment to a suitor who has slept upon his rights. Clark v. Ramsey (1915) 143 Ga. 729, 85 S. E. 869; Richards v. Richards (1913) L.R.A.1917B.

Negligent delay to assail it in time is often fatal to an attack upon a judgment. O'Rourke v. Lawrence (1913) 132 La. 710, 61 So. 764.

Whoever would have a judgment set aside on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, duress, accident, mistake, or surprise must act diligently in seeking relief, and the rule requiring diligence and prompt action in attacking judgments upon such grounds is the same respecting decrees of divorce as other judgments and decrees. McNeil v. McNeil (1909) 95 C. C. A. 485, 170 Fed. 289; Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134; Hendley v. Chabert (1914) 189 Ala. 258, 65 So. 993; *Hereu v. e. Where complainant contested the divorce on grounds relied upon for relief from the decree.

A court will never set aside or annul a judgment or decree for any matter which was actually presented and considered in rendering it. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

Matters which the court granting a decree had to consider in granting it afford no ground to support an attack upon it. Cheever v. Kelly (1915) 96 Kan. 269, 150 Pac. 529.

A bill in equity to reopen and review a previous judgment upon grounds relating to the original cause of action and the defense thereto is bad on demurrer, because these matters are all concluded by the judgment attacked. Corney v. Corney (1913) 108 Ark. 415, 159 S. W. 20.

A retrial of a divorce suit, fully heard and decided upon the merits, cannot be had under the guise of proceedings to set aside the decree granted, on the ground of its procurement by fraud, by means of perjured testimony. Folsom v. Folsom (1874) 55 N. H. 78.

A complaint in equity to set aside a divorce cannot re-try the charges upon which that divorce was granted. Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100.

f. Where complainant might have litigated matters relied on for relief from the divorce and did not.

It is no ground for relief in equity that a judgment is wrong in law or fact or both, if the party complaining of it had an opportunity to and failed to make his defense. Hagan v. Chicago (1913) 259 Ill. 249, 102 N. E. 185; Mushbaugh v. East Peoria (1913) 260 Ill. 27, 102 N. E. 1027.

A party who was regularly served with process in an action, and did not defend it, can have no relief in equity L.R.A.1917B.

from a judgment rendered against him in the action, where he was not prevented from defending it by fraud or accident, unmixed with his own negligence. Day v. Hurchman (1913) 65 Fla. 186, 61 So. 445.

No rule is said to be better established than that a court of equity will not give relief against a judgment or decree in respect of a matter as to which the complainant could have had redress in the previous litigation, and was not prevented from obtaining it by accident, fraud, or the conduct of his adversary, unmixed with his own fault or negligence. Duckworth v. Duckworth (1859) 35 Ala. 70.

To maintain a bill in equity to enjoin a judgment at law upon defenses which might have been, but were not, interposed to present the judgment, the complainant must show that the failure to prevent such defenses was attributable to fraud, accident, surprise, or the act of his adversary. Weems v. Weems (1882) 73 Ala. 462.

It is a general rule that a court of equity will not open the judgment of another court to let the defeated litigant make a defense which might have been made in the action which culminated in the judgment. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

Anything that might have been set up in a suit which went to judgment, to prevent such judgment, cannot be set up as ground for annulling that judgment, unless it was not and could not have been discovered so as to be available until after judgment was rendered. Boudreaux v. Lower Terrebonne Ref. & Mfg. Co. (1910) 127 La. 98, 53 So. 456.

Equity will refuse relief from a judgment to one who might easily have prevented it, and obtained all he was entitled to by appearing and asking for it in the action which resulted in the judgment. Hanson v. Ralston (1912) 168 Ill. App. 163.

Upon an application addressed to the discretion of the court, pursuant to an authorizing statute, to have made absolute a decree of divorce granted three years previously, to a wife from her husband, founded upon his gross habitual drunkenness and wanton failure to provide for and maintain her, where he had been personally served with process and had appeared, but had withdrawn his appearance and voluntarily defaulted, supported by proof that, during the three years that had elapsed, the parties had continuously lived apart, the decree will not be opened, no fraud in obtaining it being alleged, to allow the defendant to contest on the merits, and adduce evidence to disprove the wife's charges against him upon which the decree was founded. Whiting v. Whiting (1874) 114 Mass. 494.

A final decree of divorce, untainted by any fraud whatever, in a suit really contested, with the litigants appearing by adverse counsel, granted upon a consideration by the court of the pleadings and proofs on both sides, to the wife, pursuant to an understanding that further opposition would not be made if she would, as she did, take such decree without costs and alimony, cannot afterwards, at the instance of the husband, be set aside upon the mere ground that he was ignorant of the law, and did not know that, by statute, such decree entitled his wife at once to dower in his lands. Orth v. Orth (1888) 60 Mich. 158, 37 N. W. 67.

Inasmuch as one who had no defense to an action is not damnified by a judgment rendered in it against him, no matter by what means, because judgment would have gone against him in due course anyway, ordinarily, one seeking in a court of equity or otherwise to set aside a judgment against him, entered in an action in which he was regularly brought into court, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, duress, accident, mistake, or surprise which prevented him from making his defense, is bound as a prerequisite to getting relief to show that he had and has a valid and meritorious defense to the cause of action upon which the judgment he complains of rests. White v. Crow (1883) 110 U. S. 183, 28 L. ed. 113, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 71; Hendley v. Chabert (1914) 189 Ala. 258, 65 So. 993; Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. Carlson (1910) 86 Neb. 847, 126 N. W. L.R.A. 1917B.

515; Blank v. Blank (1887) 107 N. Y. 91, 13 N. E. 615; Batzer v. Halliday (1915) 31 N. D. 361, 153 N. W. 994; Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270; Sperry v. Sperry (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 419; Wade v. Wade (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 643; McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

A court of equity will not disturb a judgment at law, however defective or dubious the methods taken to obtain it, unless the litigant against whom it was rendered had a valid and sufficient defense to the action. Hussey v. Gourley (1910) 153 Ill. App. 501.

To set aside a judgment at law through a bill in equity it must appear that he against whom the judgment was rendered was deprived of either a meritorious defense or a just cause of action. Treat v. Merchant's Life Asso. (1912) 167 Ill. App. 371.

To succeed in setting aside, in a suit brought for the purpose, a decree of divorce for fraud or unfairness in preventing a defense, the complaining suitor is bound to show that there was and is a meritorious defense. McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

When a plaintiff's right to annul his marriage was indisputable, and the defendant's total lack of any defense to the action is clearly established, a decree of annulment will not be set aside on motion, on the ground that it was granted by default induced by a fraud which prevented a defense. Everett v. Morrison (1892) 66 Hun. 632, 50 N. Y. S. R. 33, 21 N. Y. Supp. 328.

A mere general allegation that a defendant seeking to set aside a judgment of divorce has a meritorious defense to the cause of action upon which it rests is insufficient to warrant relief. Wade v. Wade (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 643.

A defendant who seeks to set aside a judgment of divorce against him must not only aver a meritorious defense to the cause of action upon which it rests, but he must specifically state the facts which support that defense. Ibid.

A decree of divorce grounded upon more than one cause of action may not be set aside unless a meritorious defense, with facts stated as its basis, to each cause of action, is set up; because, if to any cause of action there is no defense, that cause will be sufficient to uphold the decree. Ibid.

Before a court will set aside a decree of absolute divorce granted by default upon personal service of process, and allow the defendant to come in and defend the suit, it must be made plain that the defendant had a good defense to the action, and what that defense is must appear by a proposed answer. Maguire v. Maguire (1902) 75 App. Div. 534, 78 N. Y. Supp. 312. O'Brien, J., dissenting, contended for a less rigid and technical rule in divorce suits because of the public concern.

It is essential to the maintenance of a bill in equity to enjoin a judgment at law that the complainant allege and prove a good and meritorious defense to the cause of action, or to such part of it as he seeks to litigate by the bill. Weems v. Weems (1882) 73 Ala. 462.

A decree granted by default, annulling a marriage, will not be set aside in an action brought for the purpose, alleging a fraud in obtaining it through misrepresentation and deceit that induced the defendant to refrain from consulting counsel and making a defense to the action to annul, when the defendant neither alleges nor proves that there was any defense. Blank v. Blank (1887) 107 N. Y. 91, 13 N. E. 615.

An application to open a default in a divorce suit and to set aside the decree where a defendant was personally served with process must be supported by proof of a meritorious and legal defense. Phelps v. Phelps (1838) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 150.

One who had no defense to a divorce suit cannot have a decree taken in it by the opposite party by default upon constructive service set aside or nullified for irregularities or defects in the papers and proceedings. Carr v. Carr (1892) 92 Ky. 552, 36 Am. St. Rep. 614, 18 S. W. 453.

One who seeks relief in equity on technical grounds against a judgment must show a just and meritorious defense, making it at least a possibility that the judgment, if a new trial is had, will be a different one. Van Buren v. Posteraro (1909) 45 Colo. 588, 132 Am. St. Rep. 199, 102 Pac. 1067.

The failure of a party applying to vacate a decree of divorce rendered against him to make out a good defense on the merits to the divorce action justifies a denial of his application. Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017.

A woman who in her petition to set aside a divorce obtained by her husband on the ground of her adultery, fails to show any defense to the suit, and when it appears that there were good grounds for granting him a divorce, should be refused relief where she had due notice and full knowledge of all the proceedings while they were pending, and stayed away from the hearing because, as she alleged, her husband's statements led her to believe her adultery made it unsafe for her to attend. Taylor v. Taylor (1913) 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 388.

Proceedings to vacate judgments are, in Washington, original ones, regulated by statute, by which they may not be set aside until it has been adjudged that there is a valid defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered. Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

In a bill in equity to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by default without personal service of process, upon the ground that it was procured by a fraud upon the court, committed by the successful party in falsely swearing to the existence of facts which did not exist, and were essential to the jurisdiction of the court, it is unnecessary for the complainant to show any defense to the alleged ground of divorce. Corney v. Corney (1906) 79 Ark. 289, 116 Am. St. Rep. 80, 95 S. W. 135.

If an affidavit to set aside a decree of divorce granted by default without a personal service contains sufficient denials of material matters alleged in the complaint, and sets forth a good defense on the merits, if its averments are true, there is no necessity for accompanying it with an affidavit of merits. McBlain v. McBlain (1888) 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61.

A motion to vacate a judgment and for a new trial in a divorce suit does not require the support of an affidavit of merits, where the decree was taken ex parte, in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, after issue had been joined and the cause was awaiting trial, and was transferred without notice from the forum in which it was expected to be heard to another. Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531.

An affidavit of merits has no place in a proceeding to set aside, upon facts establishing either collusion of the parties or else that the aggrieved party was grossly misled and deceived by the other, a decree of divorce rendered for want of an answer to the complaint. Mulkey v. Mulkey (1893) 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621.

An affidavit of merits, while not material as such, which contains specific denials of the allegations of the complaint, may take the place of a proposed answer, in some circumstances, upon a motion to set aside a decree of divorce entered on default for want of an answer, where the facts disclosed show either collusive conduct of the parties or gross deception by the successful one of the other. Ibid.

VIII. Perjury committed in obtaining divorce as ground for relief.

It is a general rule that presenting fabricated evidence or perjured testimony upon a trial where the falsity might or should have been exposed and refuted is not such a fraud in obtaining a judgment or decree as will warrant its nullification.

by the successful party was given to procure the judgment on the trial of a divorce suit affords no sufficient ground for setting aside the decree. Zeitlin v. Zeitlin (1909) 202 Mass. 205, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 569, 132 Am. St. Rep. 490, 88 N. E. 762.

Although a decree of divorce was obtained by fraud and false testimony, it cannot, in Ohio, if the court which granted it had jurisdiction of the subject and the parties, be set aside on an original bill filed at a subsequent term. Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482; Neil v. Neil (1883) 38 Ohio St. 558; Knapp v. Thomas (1883) 39 Ohio St. 377, 48 Am. Rep. 462.

An absolute divorce obtained by a husband against his wife upon the ground of her adultery cannot be successfully attacked by her and set aside in a subsequent suit brought by her against him to procure a divorce in her favor, grounded upon his desertion, and based upon allegations that his decree was got by perjured testimony suborned by him, and through his collusive fraud with the false witnesses. Greene v. Greene (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454.

Inasmuch as an action for divorce will not survive the death of one of the parties to it, after the death of the successful party a decree of divorce entered on default and attacked on the ground that it was procured by perjured testimony, without personal service of process, cannot be set aside to permit a defense to be interposed and tried. Kirschner v. Dietrich (1895) 110 Cal. 502, 42 Pac. 1064.

A separate action cannot be maintained to set aside a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction on the ground that it was procured by false testimony, where the court which rendered it has ample power to give adequate relief from it upon an application in the same suit. Johnston v. Paul (1876) 23 Minn. 46; Wieland v. Shillock (1876) 23 Minn. 227.

A reason given for the refusal of courts to set aside judgments rendered upon trials of issues of fact by tribunals which fully heard the testimony of both litigants, where it is alleged that the judgments were obtained by means of false testimony on the trial and subornation of perjury by the successful litigant, is that, in a large proportion of all cases tried, it might plausibly be contended that some part of the material testimony was untrue, and that in a great many cases it might be charged and strongly supported that the prevailing party had knowingly given or procured others to give false testimony upon the issues involved. Zeitlin v. Zeitlin (1909) 202 Mass. 205, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 569, 132 Am. St. Rep. 490, 88 N. E. 762.

The general rule that a judgment will not be set aside because it was obtained by means of perjury has not been accepted as a sound one in a line of cases in Texas. Bell v. Walnitzch (1873) 39 Tex. 132; Overton v. Blum (1878) 50 Tex. 423; McMurray v. McMurray (1887) 67 Tex. 666, 4 S. W. 357; Dickinson v. Dickinson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 205.

In Louisiana an action to annul a decree of divorce has been held to be maintainable on the ground that it was obtained by means of false testimony given by the witnesses in behalf of the successful party, provided it is alleged and clearly proved that the perjury was not discovered until within one year before the action to annul was brought. Emuy v. Farr (1910) 125 La. 825, 51 So. 1003.

In Nebraska countenance has been given in sundry cases to the doctrine that obtaining a judgment by means of wilful and intentional perjury in order to make out a cause of action or establish a defense on a trial constitutes such a fraud as entitles the defeated litigant to have the judgment set aside. Hard v. Hard (1897) 51 Neb. 412, 70 N. W. 1122; Barr v. Post (1899) 59 Neb. 361, 80 Am. St. Rep. 680, 80 N. W. 1041; City Sav. Bank v. Carlon (1910) 87 Neb. 266, 127 N. W. 161; Koop v. Acken (1911) 90 Neb. 77, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 782, 132 N. W. 721; Wunrath v. People's Furniture & Carpet Co. (1915) 98 Neb. 342, 152 N. W. 736.

In North Carolina a judgment procured by false testimony knowingly and corruptly given is deemed to have been obtained by fraud, and may be set aside or otherwise nullified in equity, provided the perjurer has been convicted of the crime. Peagram v. King (1823) 9 N. C. (2 Hawks,) 605, 11 Am. Dec. 793; Burgess v. Lovengood (1856) 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 457; Dyche v. Patton (1857) 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 332; Moore v. Gulley (1907) 144 N. C. 81, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 242, 56 S. E. 681; Mottu v. Davis (1910) 153 N. C. 160, 69 S. E. 63.

The decision of Green, J., at special term of the city court of New York, in Wieser v. Times Realty & Constr. Co. (1910) 131 N. Y. Supp. 337, was one of the few instances reported of setting aside a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury after a contested trial, and L.R.A. 1017B.

after an affirmance on appeal, because of the confessed perjury on the trial of an important witness in testifying to a material part of the successful litigant's case. The perjury was flagrant and undenied. The learned judge, righteously indignant, gave way to his indignation, but cited no authorities and ignored the general rule.

If any fraud, sufficient to justify the conclusion that a different result would have been produced if it had not existed, extrinsic or collateral to the issues, accompanied false swearing or perjury by which a judgment was procured, such judgment may be set aside as fraudulent. Wood v. Wood (1906) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

The general rule forbidding the setting aside of a judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction because it was obtained by means of manufactured evidence and false testimony was examined, and exceptions to it were mentioned and limits to its application stated in a recent decision of the Wisconsin supreme court. Boring v. Ott (1909) 138 Wis. 260, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1080, 119 N. W. 865.

There are, it has been said, authorities holding that a judgment obtained by perjured testimony may be set aside in equity; but, it was added, this is not believed to be the law, and the reason given was that "to investigate the character of testimony upon which a judgment was obtained would be to retry the issues submitted in the trial at which the judgment was obtained and the result would be that there would be no end to the litigation." Brown v. Trent (1912) 36 Okla. 239, 128 Pac. 895.

Actions to set aside judgments which had been procured by perjury or subornation of perjury were authorized by statute (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 285) in Minnesota. Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341.

The text of this statute appears in Spooner v. Spooner (1879) 26 Minn. 137, 1 N. W. 838.

This statute was declared to be derogatory to the well-established and salutary principle and policy of the common law which forbids the retrial of issues once determined by final judgment, and, therefore, an enactment which should not be so construed as to extend its operation beyond its most obvious import. Stewart v. Duncan (1889) 40 Minn. 410, 42 N. W. 89.

Although in Minnesota an action to set aside a judgment which had been procured by perjury or subornation of perjury was expressly authorized by this statute, it has been decided that an action to set aside a judgment will not lie in virtue of it where the pleadings disclosed a fact to be proved, so that the adverse litigant knew what the pleader would attempt to prove, and was under no necessity of depending on the pleader to prove the fact as he claimed it, and the perjury was committed in proving such fact. Hass v. Billings (1889) 42 Minn. 63, 43 N. W. 797; Colby v. Colby (1894) 59 Minn. 432, 50 Am. St. Rep. 420, 61 N. W. 460; Watkins v. Landon (1897) 67 Minn. 136, 69 N. W. 711; O'Brien v. Larson (1898) 71 Minn. 371, 74 N. W. 148; Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310; Moudry v. Witzka (1903) 89 Minn. 300, 94 N. W. 885; Bisseberg v. Ree (1906) 99 Minn. 481, 109 N. W. 1115; Hayward v. Larrabee (1908) 106 Minn. 210, 130 Am. St. Rep. 606, 118 N. W. 795; Major v. Leonard (1911) 115 Minn. 439, 132 N. W. 915; McElrath v. McElrath (1913) 120 Minn. 380, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, 139 N. W. 708.

This statute was, it has been said, never intended to excuse a litigant from exercising proper diligence in preparing for trial and learning the facts of which evidence was available. Wann v. Northwestern Trust Co. (1913) 120 Minn. 493, 139 N. W. 1061.

While perjury on the part of a plaintiff respecting a fact not exclusively or peculiarly within his knowledge, for example, that the defendant was physically impotent to bear children, is not enough, of itself, to sustain an action under this statute to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by him by means of false testimony, yet, when such perjury was a part of a fraudulent scheme of his to divorce his wife and prevent her from opposing him, it is a circumstance which adds weight to the attack on the decree when associated with other impeaching proof. Colby v. Colby (1894) 59 Minn. 432, 50 Am. St. Rep. 420, 61 N. W. 460.

IX. Admission of incompetent or prejudiced testimony as ground for relief from divorce.

A defendant who made default in a divorce suit after being regularly served, and well knowing the pendency of the action, cannot overturn the decree rendered on the ground that the chief witness for the plaintiff gave exaggerated testimony. O'Brien v. D'Hemecourt (1907) 118 La. 996, 43 So. 654.

The fact, if true, that the chief witness for a plaintiff in a divorce suit was biased against the defendant, and gave exaggerated and unjust testimony, will not warrant setting aside the decree where there was other unobjectionable and unassailed testimony which gave ample corroboration. Ibid.

It is no ground for setting aside a decree of divorce rendered in regular proceedings after due service against a defendant by default, that, in taking proof of the plaintiff's charges, an incompetent piece of evidence was erroneously admitted, when without it there was ample testimony properly received to sustain the decree, and the error was not prejudicial. Ibid.

A decree of divorce will not be set aside because improper testimony respecting the defendant's identity was admitted, when there was other unobjectionable testimony in to prove it. Robertson v. Robertson (1880) 9 Daly (N. Y.) 44.

X. Insufficiency of evidence to warrant divorce as a basis of attack.

That the evidence was insufficient to warrant a judgment of divorce is not sufficient to sustain an action to annul the decree. Emuy v. Farr (1910) 125 La. 825, 51 So. 1003; Miller v. Bearb (1914) 134 La. 893, 64 So. 822.

A decree of divorce which rested upon some substantial testimony will not, after several months have passed, be set aside on the ground that it was not supported by sufficient testimony. Robertson v. Robertson (1880) 9 Daly (N. Y.) 44.

After the denial of a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict, the defeated party cannot avoid the judgment by moving to set it aside upon the same ground. Treat v. Treat (1915) 170 Cal. 337, 150 Pac. 57.

A motion to set aside a judgment, entered after a verdict on a trial, does not call in question the competency or sufficiency of the evidence upon which it rests. Penn v. McGhee (1909) 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686.

The ordinary remedy of one aggrieved by a judgment of divorce that rests upon insufficient evidence is an appeal, and not a motion to vacate the decree. Wiemer v. Wiemer (1911) 21 N. D. 371, 130 N. W. 1015.

Although a judgment of divorce cannot rest upon a defendant's acknowledgment that the charges stated in the complaint are true, without other proof, nevertheless a divorce granted upon such evidence, recognized and invoked by both parties in subsequent judicial proceedings, and acquiesced in for more than thirty years, will not be treated as a nullity in proceedings for administering the estate of the deceased husband, for the purpose of determining whether certain property should or should not be included as a part of such estate. Weigel's Succession (1866) 18 La. Ann. 49.

The quantum and probative force of the evidence upon which a decree of divorce was granted will not be examined upon a bill in equity to set the decree aside, except in so far as it may tend to establish fraud in procuring the divorce. Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100.

A decree of divorce obtained without proof of the facts alleged, by default brought about through the payment of money to defendant to induce the putting in of an insufficient defense, and allowing it to be stricken out because it raised no issue, is properly set aside for fraud and collusion in its procurement, even at the suit of the defendant, and notwithstanding his reprehensible conduct. True v. True (1861) 6 Minn. 458, Gil. 315.

XI. Burden of proof where divorces are attacked.

A burden rests upon whoever seeks to set aside a judgment or decree of proving facts and establishing grounds sufficient to warrant the court in annulling it. Waldrom v. Waldrom (1884) 76 Ala. 285; Corney v. Corney (1913) 108 Ark. 415, 159 S. W. 20; Re James (1893) 99 Cal. 374, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, 35 Pac. 1122; Penn v. McGhee (1908) 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686; Van Sickle v. Harmeyer (1912) 172 Ill. App. 218; Ellis v. White (1883) 61 Iowa, 644, 17 N. W. 28; Erickson v. Erickson (1914) — Iowa, —, 147 N. W. 737; Carr v. Carr (1892) 92 Ky. 552, 36 Am. St. Rep. 614, 18 S. W. 453; Miller v. Bearb (1914) 134 La. 893, 64 So. 822; Sperry v. Sperry (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 419; Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

The burden is on the party who institutes the proceeding to set aside a decree of divorce to show that it ought not to have been granted, and to establish grounds for vacating it. Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017.

Whoso would overturn a final judgment of divorce, acted upon by the spouse who procured it, must make out most clearly a right to the relief sought. L.R.A.1917B.

Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

If, for example, a decree of divorce is charged to have been collusive, the burden of proving the collusion must be sustained by the spouse who attacks it on that ground. Hopkins v. Hopkins (1875) 39 Wis. 167.

And if a decree of divorce is sought to be set aside because, during the pendency of the suit in which it was granted, the spouse who obtained it condoned the other's offenses by cohabiting as before, the burden of proving such cohabitation and condonation rests upon the assailant of the decree. Morton v. Morton (1897) 117 Cal. 443, 49 Pac. 557; Faulkner v. Faulkner (1916) 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404.

One bringing suit to set aside a judgment taken against him is bound to show that he was wholly free from negligence in preparing for trial and learning the facts of which evidence was available. Wann v. North Western Trust Co. (1913) 120 Minn. 493, 139 N. W. 1061.

The burden rests upon a litigant who seeks to set aside a judgment taken against him for want of a defense, of showing that he was prevented from making his defense when he had a good one by fraud, accident, or the conduct of his adversary, unmixed with negligence on his part. Clark v. Ramsey (1915) 143 Ga. 729, 85 S. E. 869.

To entitle a spouse against whom a judgment of divorce has been rendered to have it set aside in a suit brought for the purpose, it is necessary to allege and prove circumstances of unfairness or fraud operating to prevent a defense or fair trial. McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

It is elementary that fraud will not be presumed when parties do not stand in fiduciary relations. McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534.

The burden is on everyone who seeks to set aside a judgment or decree on the ground that it was obtained by fraud of proving the fraud charged. Davis v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462; Clark v. Ramsey (Ga.) supra; Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017; Hopkins v. Hopkins (1875) 39 Wis. 167.

A charge of fraud in obtaining a judgment of divorce must, in order to sustain a bill in equity to set it aside, be established by the clearest and most satisfactory evidence. Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017; Whiting v. Whiting (1874) 114 Mass.

494; Holbrook v. Holbrook (1874) 114 Mass. 568; Watkinson v. Watkinson (1904) 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 Ann. Cas. 326; Wiemer v. Wiemer (1911) 21 N. D. 371, 130 N. W. 1015; Sperry v. Sperry (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 419; McConkey v. McConkey (Tex.) supra; McDonald v. McDonald (1904) 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865; Douglas v. Teller (1909) 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761.

Fraud will not be imputed when the facts and circumstances out of which it is supposed to arise are fairly and reasonably consistent with honesty of purpose. McDonald v. Pearson (Ala.) supra.

A decree of divorce will not be set aside by the court after the term at which it was granted without clear proof that the applicant for relief against it was prevented by the fraud of the adverse party, or by an imposition upon the court, from being heard in the suit which resulted in the decree upon some matter constituting, if established, a good defense. Whiting v. Whiting (1874) 114 Mass. 494; Holbrook v. Holbrook (1874) 114 Mass. 568.

A decree of divorce challenged for fraud in obtaining it, and which the party complaining of it had a full opportunity to resist, should not be set aside upon very weak and fairly negatived evidence. Catts v. Catts (1908) 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 293.

A refusal to set aside a judgment alleged to have been taken in violation of an agreement of counsel to continue a pending case, relied upon by his adversary, who was, in consequence, absent, will not be disturbed where the agreement was denied and the testimony respecting the making of it was conflicting, because fraud must be clearly established. Beck v. Jackson (1911) 160 Mo. App. 427, 140 S. W. 919.

Whether a fraud was or was not committed in obtaining a divorce is a question of fact for the determination of the court in the first instance in proceedings to set aside a decree upon that ground, and its decision, when resting upon evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal. Miller v. Miller (1914) 37 Nev. 257, 142 Pac. 218.

Fraud in procuring a decree of divorce pro confesso after service of process by publication only is not established by strongly contradicted testimony relating to the plaintiff's length of residence requisite to confer jurisdiction. Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017. L.R.A. 1917B.

An order granting a wife's motion to set aside a divorce granted her husband was reversed and the judgment was reinstated in McCanna v. McCanna (1914) 28 N. D. 30, 147 N. W. 718; because the supreme court, after examining the testimony, found that the wife's charges that the decree had been procured by fraud, deceit, and coercion, that she had not been personally served with process, that the attorney who appeared for her acted without authority, and that the evidence upon which the decree was based was insufficient, were all unfounded and untrue.

One who attacks a decree of divorce regular on its face, granted by a court of competent jurisdiction by default, after service by publication, on the ground that the allegations of the petition and the affidavit for publication were knowingly false and untrue, and hence that the decree was procured by fraud, is bound to show by affirmative and positive averments actual ignorance of the proceedings in the divorce suit while they were pending. Larimer v. Knoyle (1890) 43 Kan. 338, 23 Pac. 487.

After a lapse of forty years, a marriage contracted with another man by a woman previously married to a man living at the time of the second marriage is presumed to be legal by reason of a valid divorce from her former husband, so as to put the burden of proving the contrary upon a party questioning the validity of the second marriage. Howton v. Gilpin (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 630, 69 S. W. 766.

One who seeks annulment of his marriage to a divorced woman has the burden of proving not only that her former husband was living when the marriage took place, but that her decree of divorce from him was void. Hall v. Hall (1910) 139 App. Div. 120, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

Rights originally founded in fraud may and do, through difficulty of proving the fraud, become unassailable by ordinary legal methods. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

Forasmuch as the burden which rests upon a party who attacks in equity a judgment on the ground that it was procured by fraud, of establishing the fraud charged, is a heavy one, he ought to be as unhampered as possible in presenting proof of the fraud. Davis v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462.

The proof of fraud to impeach a judgment or decree in equity, while necessarily required to be clear and convincing, is not required to establish the fraud beyond all reasonable doubt. McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534.

In proceedings to vacate a decree of divorce where a valid defense to the suit is established, had under the statute of Washington (Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 465 et seq.), the court may first hear and determine the grounds for setting aside or modifying the decree before passing upon the validity of the defense. Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

XII. Attacks on divorces based on illegal service of process.

Many attacks upon judgments of divorce have been based upon the charge that the spouse against whom the decree was granted never had a day in court, because never brought before the court by any legal service of process. If the complaining spouse has never waived the objection and never been estopped to raise it, such a charge, if well founded and established before a court having power and jurisdiction to determine it in an appropriate suit or proceeding, seasonably instituted, is fatal to the judgment.

In a divorce suit a legal service of process of some sort, either personal or constructive, in conformity to an authorizing statute, is essential. Stephens v. Stephens (1884) 62 Tex. 337; Weatherbee v. Weatherbee (1866) 20 Wis. 499.

If no legal service, either personal or constructive, in compliance with a statute, was made in a divorce suit, the decree granted therein cannot stand. Stephens v. Stephens (Tex.) supra.

One who can demonstrate that a judgment or decree asserted as conclusive against him was obtained in a suit of the pendency of which he had neither actual nor constructive notice or knowledge, and to which he had a meritorious defense, may obtain relief from it in a court of equity. McAdams v. Windham (1915) 191 Ala. 287, 68 So. 51.

A judgment of divorce founded on a service of process on the defendant personally, outside the limits of the state, without any order for publication, and without the entry of any appearance, is void and may be set aside at any time, notwithstanding the defendant in writing waived any other service, and admitted due service. Weatherbee v. Weatherbee (Wis.) supra.

A provision in a statute for substituted service of process to begin suits by leaving a copy with some member of the defendant's family, over fourteen years old, at his domicile, when he is absent from the state, but is a resident thereof, as the first service in order after personal service, does not apply to divorce suits against a spouse residing permanently in the state, but temporarily absent from it, because such a suit interrupts the marital relation so that such service is less likely to give notice than one by publication and mailing to the temporary postoffice address, the next service allowed by the statute; hence, a decree of divorce granted to a wife from her husband upon a service by publication and mailing of summons and complaint to the defendant at his sojourning place in another country is not void. McFarlane v. Cornelius (1903) 43 Or. 513, 73 Pac. 325, 74 Pac. 468.

A decree of divorce obtained by a wife from her husband while he was confined in the penitentiary on a conviction for felony, upon a service of process by the sheriff by leaving a copy of it at his residence with the wife herself (a legal service in ordinary cases), was refused annulment by the Georgia supreme court, after the husband's marriage to another woman and death, in a contest between his widow and son by his first marriage, to administer his estate. McLeod v. McLeod (1915) 144 Ga. 359, 87 S. E. 286.

A motion by a defendant to set aside a decree of divorce obtained against him by his wife upon a service of process and notice made by order of the court without the state, upon him personally, grounded upon his assertion that he was never served, must be denied where the proof of service was full, complete, and satisfactory, and his affidavits to the contrary were shown to be false. Provost v. Provost (1892) 46 N. Y. S. R. 366, 18 N. Y. Supp. 896.

XIII. Attacks based on false returns of personal service of process in divorce suits.

It is a general rule that a return by a public officer duly authorized by law to serve legal process, of personal service of process upon a defendant, is conclusive, and a judgment following and founded upon it is not open to attack on the ground that such return was really false. Ellis v. Nuckols (1911) 237 Mo. 290, 140 S. W. 867.

This rule, while generally recognized and applied, has not commanded universal approval, even with respect of ordinary judgments; and on occasions when assented to in ordinary cases, decrees of divorce have been esteemed to constitute exceptions to its application.

One against whom a judgment or decree has been rendered on default, and who, in fact, was never served with process in the suit, and did not know it was pending, may in a proper proceeding, at a proper time, and before a competent tribunal, be relieved from the judgment notwithstanding a false return of a public officer that the process was duly served. Wells, F. & Co. v. W. B. Baker Lumber Co. (1913) 107 Ark. 415, 155 S. W. 122.

A divorce granted by default against an absent defendant upon a false return of a personal service, clearly proved never to have been made, is obtained by a fraud upon the court and defendant, and must be set aside on the latter's petition. Stephens v. Stephens (1884) 62 Tex. 337.

The rule which makes unquestionable the return of a public officer of service of process being grounded in public policy based upon the idea that it is better for an injured party to seek compensation by suit against the officer for a false return than to impugn the verity of judicial records ought not and cannot be rightfully applied in an application to set aside a decree of divorce entered by default, and made the very next day, before any actual change in the status of the parties had occurred, and based upon incontrovertible proof that the process had not in fact been served on the defendant. Brown v. Brown (1871) 59 Ill. 315.

The reason why a party against whom a decree of divorce has been entered by default, and who applies immediately, before any new rights have supervened or any change in the plaintiff's circumstances has occurred, to set aside the decree and for permission to appear and defend, on the ground that no process was served, is allowed to impeach the sheriff's return of service, contrary to the general rule which makes a public officer's return unimpeachable and relegates the aggrieved party to a suit for damages against the officer for making a false return, is that in a divorce suit the damage is irreparable and the remedy by action inadequate, since no money compensation can measure the loss of a spouse and the care and companionship of children. Ibid.

A delay of eleven years by a former wife, who, all the time, knew that her husband had been granted a divorce from her, in bringing a bill in equity to set aside the decree on the ground of a conspiracy between the plaintiff and the sheriff to make a fraudulent and false official return of personal service of process upon her, where both the sheriff and the former husband have died in the interim, constitutes laches requiring the dismissal of the bill. Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828.

A former wife whose husband, through an official return, false in fact, of personal service of process upon her, obtained by default a divorce from her providing for the payment of a stated sum monthly by him to her as permanent alimony, who, on learning that the decree had been granted, forewent an attack upon it in consideration of the husband's promise to pay her monthly a considerably larger sum than the decree awarded, is thereby estopped from maintaining suit for damages from the false return against the officer and his surety, begun because the husband failed to keep his promises. Morgan v. Fidelity & D. Co. (Morgan v. Williams) (1912) 66 Wash. 649, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 292, 120 Pac. 106.

XIV. Need of conforming to statute in making constructive service of process on defendant spouses in divorce suits.

Failure strictly to comply with all the requirements of the statute authorizing constructive service of the initiating process in divorce suits by publication when personal service cannot be made is fatal to the validity of a decree obtained by default. Miller v. Miller (1914) 37 Nev. 257, 142 Pac. 218; Wortman v. Wortman (1863) 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 66; Dallas v. Luster (1914) 27 N. D. 450, 147 N. W. 95; Rodgers v. Nichols (1905) 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923; Richardson v. Howard (1915) — Okla. —, 151 Pac. 887.

A decree of divorce entered by default after a service only by publication is properly set aside upon a subsequent direct application to vacate it where the affidavit for publication was fatally defective in form and substance. Patterson v. Patterson (1896) 57 Kan. 275, 46 Pac. 304.

A decree of divorce entered by default in a suit in which the defendant was served only by publication, and did not appear, is a nullity unless the affidavit to procure substituted service contained every fact required by the statute to be stated in it. Atkins v. Atkins (1879) 9 Neb. 191, 2 N. W. 466.

A decree of divorce against a nonresident defendant where notice was given only by publication and mailing, if granted by default, should, upon seasonable application, be set aside, and the suit should be dismissed upon proof that the statute authorizing service by publication or conferring jurisdiction in such cases was departed from in one or more particulars, because a strict compliance with the statute is prerequisite to a valid decree. Smith v. Smith (1854) 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 266; Pinkney v. Pinkney (1854) 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 324.

That a wife suing for a divorce by guardian ad litem because she was then an infant did not in person verify the petition in the suit, and did not allege in that petition absence of collusion, restraint, and bad faith, when a mandatory statute required the petition in a divorce suit to contain such allegations, and required also that it be verified by the plaintiff, were sufficient reasons for holding null a decree of divorce granted her upon such petition, in a subsequent action of ejectment in which the right to recover possession of the land involved depended upon the validity of the divorce. Hinkle v. Lovelace (1907) 204 Mo. 208, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730, 120 Am. St. Rep. 698, 102 S. W. 1015, 11 Ann. Cas. 794.

A decree of divorce obtained by default by a man from his wife without notice to her save constructively by publication is rightly set aside in an original action brought for the purpose by her against him, upon evidence establishing the insufficiency of his affidavit to uphold the substituted service, and the falsity of his charge that she had wilfully deserted him, as the ground of divorce in his favor, coupled with proof that his cruel and inhuman treatment, specifically shown, had really driven her from home. Hard v. Hard (1897) 51 Neb. 412, 70 N. W. 1122.

An affidavit to obtain authority to publish the summons in a divorce suit, which utterly fails to show any diligent effort to find the defendant within the state and make a personal service, and neither states the defendant's residence nor any efforts to learn it, gives the court no jurisdiction of the defendant's person. Yorke v. Yorke (1893) 3 N. D. 343, 55 N. W. 1095.

A decree of divorce rendered in an action commenced by publication of summons only, and not defended, should be set aside where the affidavit to procure the order for such service, while stating the fact that defendant did not reside within the state, omitted to state, as the statute required, that efforts to find and serve the defendant within the state had been duly made and were without success. Wortman v. Wortman (1863) 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 66.

The discretion of the court is properly exercised in opening a decree of divorce entered by default, and allowing the defendant to defend the action on the merits, upon the application of a wife who had in fact no notice of the proceedings, and was served by publication only, where contradictory assertions disputed as to whether or not she left home of purpose to separate permanently from her husband, or by his consent, in confidence of his unabated affection, and where, too, the affidavit to obtain an order to publish was made by the attorney on information and belief, merely stating in formal language that her residence was unknown, was not within the state, and could not, with reasonable inquiry, be ascertained, and set forth no effort to learn it, while circumstances pointed to the fact that her destination was known and her postoffice address might easily have been ascertained. Smith v. Smith (1871) 3 Or. 363.

A decree of divorce obtained by a woman from her husband by default after a constructive service of process by publication may be adjudged a nullity in an action of ejectment, where the right of the plaintiff to recover the land involved depends upon its validity, because, along with other reasons, the woman failed to comply with a mandatory statute in making the necessary proof to authorize the substituted service. Hinkle v. Lovelace (1907) 204 Mo. 208, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730, 120 Am. St. Rep. 698, 102 S. W. 1015, 11 Ann. Cas. 794.

A decree of divorce granted to a wife against her husband by default, after a service by publication only, was held void in Hinkle v. Lovelace (Mo.) supra, upon several grounds, of which the first was approved only by a majority of the court, with three of its members in dissent, although they concurred upon the other grounds. The court divided upon the question of the invalidity of the decree because the affidavit upon which the service by publication was based averred in the alternative words of the statute in point that the defendant was a nonresident of the state, or had absconded or absented himself from his usual place of abode in the state, so that the ordinary process of the law could not be served upon him. The majority held that the alternative allegations nullified each other upon the theory that he could not have been at once a nonresident and have left his usual residence in the state. Hence they concluded that the publication was unsupported by the affidavit. The opinion of the dissenting judges was not reported.

No error is committed by a court to which an application to set aside a decree of divorce is made, grounded upon fatal defects and omissions in form and substance in the affidavit for service by publication, in denying the plaintiff's motion to amend the affidavit, or to replace it with a new one, to be filed nunc pro tunc. Patterson v. Patterson (1896) 57 Kan. 275, 46 Pac. 304.

It is unnecessary for the complainant in a suit in equity to set aside a divorce founded upon a service by publication charged to have been illegal to appear or offer to appear generally and submit to the jurisdiction of the court in the divorce suit. Atkinson v. Atkinson (1913) 43 Utah, 53, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 499, 134 Pac. 595.

It is equally unnecessary for the complainant in such a case to set up a meritorious defense to the divorce action. Ibid.

A statute authorizing service of process in divorce suits by publication of notice in a newspaper when the defendant's residence is unknown and cannot be ascertained by the use of due diligence means by "residence" a regular and permanent place of abode, as distinguished from whereabouts, when the defendant is sojourning temporarily or traveling elsewhere, so that his exact location at any given time may be unknown and unascertainable. Spinney v. Spinney (1895) 87 Me. 484, 32 Atl. 1019.

The circumstance that an affidavit to procure an order of publication of notice of the commencement of a divorce suit against a nonresident defendant was made by the plaintiff instead of by a disinterested person, as the law required, is not sufficient to warrant the setting aside of a naked decree of divorce where the defendant, at the time the action was brought, was and for a long time before had been, a nonresident of the state, and the proceedings in other respects were regular and met all statutory requirements. Day v. Nottingham (1903) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

An application to set aside a divorce granted by default after a service by publication, for failure to aver in the affidavit to procure the order to publish efforts made to find defendant within the state, unaccompanied by any prayer for leave to answer, or by any showing of a meritorious defense, should be denied where the affidavit showed the defendant's abode to have been for a long L.R.A.1917B.

time and down to within a few days of its date in another state, and was otherwise sufficient to warrant judicial action. Peterson v. Peterson (1902) 15 S. D. 462, 90 N. W. 136.

When the court grants a motion of a defendant served only constructively by publication ordered upon an affidavit so defective that it gave no jurisdiction over the person, after a general appearance without an objection to the lack of jurisdiction, and sets aside a decree of divorce on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and was not supported by the evidence, it is not warranted in dismissing the action for divorce in toto, but only in opening it to allow the defendant to contest it on the merits. Yorke v. Yorke (1893) 3 N. D. 343, 55 N. W. 1095.

After a court has vacated a decree of divorce previously granted, because of fatal defects and omissions in the affidavit for publication of the summons, and denied the plaintiff's motion to substitute a new and sufficient affidavit nunc pro tunc, and then has given the plaintiff leave to restore the cause to the calendar for trial on the merits, the plaintiff has no cause of complaint that the suit is dismissed when regularly reached for trial, and no evidence to sustain it is offered. Patterson v. Patterson (1896) 57 Kan. 275, 46 Pac. 304.

A divorce granted upon constructive service by publication and mailing is not void because the order directing publication did not, in direct terms, specify the time within which the defendant was required to appear and answer, when it did direct publication for six consecutive weeks, and required an appearance and answer on or before the last day of publication, and a statute then provided that a defendant served by publication should appear and answer in the action on or before the last day of the time prescribed for publication in the order. McFarlane v. Cornelius (1903) 43 Or. 513, 73 Pac. 325, 74 Pac. 468.

A requirement by statute of proof of publication of a summons pursuant to an order to publish in an action against an absent defendant to be made by the affidavit of the printer within six months after the last day of publication is not mandatory but directory, and a decree of divorce granted after such a service is not void because the printer's affidavit of publication was not made until nine months after publication was completed. Ibid.

A defendant in a divorce suit, served only by publication, over whose person the court acquired no jurisdiction because of fatal defects in the affidavit to procure authority to make such service, who appears generally after judgment, and, without objecting to the lack of jurisdiction, moves to set aside the decree on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and is unsupported by the evidence, waives the defective service. Yorke v. Yorke (N. D.) supra.

XV. Misnomers of parties as grounds for attacking divorces.

As a general rule an accurate description of the parties to divorce suits by their full names in proceedings relating to the service of process is essential to validity, but this rule has its exceptions. McDermott v. Gray (1906) 198 Mo. 266, 95 S. W. 431.

The designation on the record of a divorce suit of both parties to it by parts only of their respective names, and these the least known, when associated with the plaintiff's false affidavit of the nonresidence and unknown whereabouts of the defendant, has been held to be evidence of fraud sufficient to warrant setting aside a decree obtained by default without actual notice, and when there existed a meritorious defense. Clay v. Robertson (1912) 30 Okla. 758, 120 Pac. 1102.

A decree of divorce otherwise regular, rendered in proceedings which conformed to the statutes of the state, is not invalidated merely because a middle initial was inserted in the defendant's name, and none belonged there, where there is no evidence whatever that the defendant was in any way misled or injured by the presence of the superfluous letter. Harrison v. Harrison (1851) 19 Ala. 499.

The legality of a decree of divorce is not affected in such wise as to invalidate a deed subsequently made by the wife because her Christian names in it are wrongly written or misspelled, where she is plainly identified and the husband's name is correctly given, and both parties ever recognized and acquiesced in the decree as divorcing them, during more than a score of years. Howton v. Gilpin (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 630, 69 S. W. 766.

Despite the general rule that, in proceedings leading to and completing service in divorce suits, an accurate description of the parties by their full names is essential to their validity, a decree of divorce granted to a wife from her husband by a court of competent jurisdiction, sitting in a place where he had long lived and was well known, in a suit giving his true surname, but the initials only of his Christian names, which he used in applying for his marriage license and constantly in his business transactions, cannot be invalidated by the heirs of the deceased second husband of the divorced wife in a suit respecting her property rights as widow. McDermott v. Gray (Mo.) supra.

Fraud in procuring a judgment of divorce on substituted service is not established by showing that the defendant was named as such by the second only of her two Christian names, when that name was the one by which commonly she was known. Douglas v. Teller (1909) 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761.

A court of equity, at the suit of the heirs at law of one who died intestate, will not set aside a decree of divorce granted to the widow of the deceased from a former husband merely because, in her suit for divorce, both she and her then husband were misnamed, where there was no fraud or collusion, and the decree was entered after the defendant had appeared and was heard, reciting the true names. Richardson v. King (1912) 157 Iowa, 287, 135 N. W. 640.

XVI. Questioned domicile of spouse granted divorce.

A domestic attack upon a foreign divorce usually is predicated upon a lack of jurisdiction over the persons of the spouses divorced because of their nonresidence in the divorce forum. Such cases lie outside the scope of this note. They have been presented, anyway, in the primary note to Benton's Succession, 59 L.R.A. 135, entitled, "Conflict of laws on subject of divorce," and in the supplementary case note to Sammons v. Pike, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1254, on "Impeaching decree of divorce rendered in other state on the ground of nonresidence or domicile of the person in whose favor it was granted," so that if the scope of the present note were broader, it would not be necessary to repeat work already well done.

Ordinarily a decree of divorce granted to a plaintiff who is an actual bona fide resident of the state and jurisdiction in which the suit is brought, at the time of bringing it, and who honestly conforms to all the statutory requirements throughout the procedure, is unassailable and conclusive. Loud v. Loud (1880) 129 Mass. 14; Sodini v. Sodini (1905) 94 Minn. 301, 110 Am. St. Rep. 371, 102 N. W. 861; Hester v. Hester (1912) 103 Miss. 13, 60 So. 0, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 428;

Werz v. Werz (1881) 11 Mo. App. 26; Provost v. Provost (1892) 46 N. Y. S. R. 366, 18 N. Y. Supp. 896; Wiemer v. Wiemer (1911) 21 N. D. 371, 130 N. W. 1015.

A doubt has been expressed of the power of the court in New York to allow a defendant to come in and defend a divorce suit after a decree had been regularly granted by default upon a constructive service by publication, untainted by any fraud. Denton v. Denton (1871) 41 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 221.

A wife who was sojourning, of her own volition, out of the state, and who refused to accept personal service of notice of, or to appear and defend, her husband's suit for divorce when apprised by letter of his purpose to bring and prosecute it, and who charges no fraud whatever, cannot, after the decree has been granted upon service by publication, have it set aside upon the ground that she was an actual resident of the state all the time, and only temporarily away from home on a visit. Lewis v. Lewis (1908) 138 Iowa, 593, 116 N. W. 698.

A defendant in a divorce suit begun by publication, who has actual knowledge of its pendency a month before a decree is entered, and in ample time to appear and defend, is guilty of negligence and want of diligence, and cannot have relief after judgment, from the decree taken in regular course. McDonald v. McDonald (1904) 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865.

A defendant in a divorce suit who knew it had been commenced and was pending, and who did not appear in or defend it, where the proceedings in it were in all respects regular upon their face, has no standing after a decree has been granted upon default, after a substituted service by publication, to maintain an action in another state to recover alimony out of the plaintiff's estate. McCormick v. McCormick (1910) 82 Kan. 31, 107 Pac. 546.

The fact that a marriage was celebrated in a state the laws of which made it indissoluble, and between persons domiciled there at the time, does not render invalid a decree of divorce between them, rendered in another state, pursuant to the laws thereof, after they had removed to and acquired a permanent legal residence in the latter state, notwithstanding the defeated spouse before the suit was instituted had deserted the home and returned to the former state, there permanently to remain. Harrison v. Harrison (1851) 19 Ala. 499. L.R.A.1917B.

A divorce obtained by one who did not have an actual and bona fide residence within the state, and for the length of time prior to beginning the action, required by and in conformity to a mandatory statute, is void. Dickinson v. Dickinson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 205.

A false allegation of domicile within the territorial jurisdiction of the court by a man bringing suit for a divorce from his wife, coupled with his wilfully false oath that he did not know her residence, of purpose to make only a constructive service, and to keep her ignorant of the proceedings, constitutes a fraud which invalidates the decree granted him. Holmes v. Holmes (1874) 63 Me. 420.

For a plaintiff in a divorce suit falsely to represent, when he has it not, that he has and has had, for the statutory length of time previous to bringing his suit, an actual bona fide residence within the state and county where he brings it, is to perpetrate a fraud upon the court for which the divorce obtained may be set aside. Dickinson v. Dickinson (Tex.) supra.

If the record in a divorce suit on its face shows jurisdiction, it may, nevertheless, be shown aliunde, upon a motion to set aside the decree and for a new trial under a statute providing for such a motion, that, in fact, the plaintiff, when the suit was begun, did not have an actual bona fide residence within the state and county for the length of time required by an express statute respecting divorce suits. Ibid.

When the jurisdiction of a court to entertain a suit for and to grant a divorce is made by statute to depend upon the domicile of the plaintiff, a false statement that the plaintiff has such domicile within the court's jurisdiction, made for the purpose of hiding the proceedings from the defendant and of deceiving the court into entertaining them, constitutes a fraud on the court which authorizes setting aside the decree obtained from it. Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84.

The supreme court of Kansas has held, however, that the false assertion of residence in a foreign state for the length of time required by the statutes thereof to give its courts jurisdiction of a divorce suit by a plaintiff suing a lunatic spouse, and making only constructive service by publication, is a fraud to be contested in the suit, and not an extrinsic one for which the decree granted in it can be successfully attacked and nulli-filed. Miller v. Miller (1913) 89 Kan. 151, 130 Pac. 681.

The taking up of a temporary residence in a county where a plaintiff is not generally known, for the express purpose of gaining a colorable domicile there, in order to bring a secret suit for divorce, is one of the badges of fraud. Whitcomb v. Whitcomb (1877) 46 Iowa, 437; Crow v. Crow (1914) 40 Okla. 455, 139 Pac. 122.

A decree of divorce granted upon substituted service to a man who had deserted his wife many years previously, by a court in a jurisdiction in which he had not, although the statute required him to have, a bona fide residence, but where he merely sojourned, living in concealment under an assumed name, when his real home was in another state, is invalid for his fraud in procuring it, and will be set aside in a suit in equity brought by his divorced wife, if her property rights have been cut off by the decree, notwithstanding he had married another woman, and died before the bill was filed to set the decree aside. Lawrence v. Nelson (1901) 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L.R.A. 583, 85 N. W. 84.

The mere establishing of a nominal and fictitious residence by renting lodgings and occupying them only about one night every month within the territorial jurisdiction of a divorce court to gain an ostensible residence therein for the requisite statutory time as a part of a fraudulent scheme to divorce his wife upon a lying charge of desertion, supported by perjured testimony, when he had sent her away for her health, and wilfully swore falsely that he did not know and could not learn her residence, so as to serve her only constructively by publication, vitiates for fraud a divorce granted to him. Nickerson v. Nickerson (1883) 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 210.

A decree of divorce granted ex parte in a suit between subjects of a foreign country having their actual domicile therein, upon false representation of residence within the jurisdiction of the divorce court, is void. Kellow v. Kellow (1886) 1 Lehigh Valley L. Rep. (Pa.) 202.

A finding upon conflicting evidence in a controversy over the validity of a divorce that the plaintiff in the divorce suit had, when he brought it, resided within the state for the length of time required by statute to entitle him to maintain it, should not be disturbed on appeal. Re James (1893) 99 Cal. 374, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, 33 Pac. 1122. L.R.A.1917B.

The mere fact that a husband having a domicile within the state which he had established and maintained for a decade and a half, left it to sojourn for a few months in another state, with no purpose to change his permanent abode, does not make him guilty of any fraud in alleging on oath in his suit for divorce from his wife, that he was, and for the length of time required by law had been, a resident of the state so as to give the court jurisdiction. Watkinson v. Watkinson (1904) 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 Ann. Cas. 326.

A decree of divorce granted to a non-resident defendant, brought regularly into court by a resident plaintiff, will not be set aside at the latter's instance because of a statute forbidding divorces to parties not residents for a stated previous length of time. Newman v. Newman (1910) 27 Okla. 381, 112 Pac. 1007.

Under the statutes of the state of Florida, the circumstance that a wife seeking relief from a judgment divorcing her, procured by her husband upon default, after constructive service of process by publication, with incidental alimony or maintenance, does not reside within the state, affords the husband no defense if he is a bona fide resident of the state. Miller v. Miller (1894) 33 Fla. 453, 24 L.R.A. 137, 15 So. 222; Shrader v. Shrader (1895) 36 Fla. 502, 18 So. 672.

The validity of a divorce between spouses who voluntarily appeared and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court which granted it cannot afterwards be attacked by either upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of them because they were not residents of the state. Moor v. Moor (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 63 S. W. 347.

A wife in whose favor a decree of divorce is granted upon a cross bill in her husband's suit cannot, several years afterwards, have it set aside on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction because both parties resided without the state. Ferry v. Ferry (1894) 9 Wash. 239, 37 Pac. 431.

XVII. Fraud as ground of attack on divorces.

a. In general.

Most of the attacks on judgments and decrees are founded upon charges that they were obtained by fraud. Indeed, it is safe to say that fraud in one or more of its protean forms practised on a litigant, the court, or both, constitutes the basis of more assaults upon decrees of divorce in particular than do all other invalidating grounds whatever except possibly the lack of jurisdiction to render the judgments assailed. Then, too, of all attempts to impeach and set aside judgments, those based upon fraud are the most frequently successful.

It is admitted as beyond question that fraud vitiates judgments as well as the most solemn contracts and documents. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

The judgments of courts constitute no exception to the rule that fraud vitiates every transaction. Noble v. Moses Bros. (1883) 74 Ala. 604; McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Woodruff Place v. Gorman (1912) 179 Ind. 1, 100 N. E. 296; Harding v. Alden (1832) 9 Mo. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 549; Brown v. Trent (1912) 36 Okla. 239, 128 Pac. 895; Johnson v. Filtseh (1913) 37 Okla. 510, 138 Pac. 165; Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270.

It is elemental that fraud vitiates all that it touches; and the fact that it has been crystalized into a judgment does not change the rule. Gorman v. Johnson (1910) 46 Ind. App. 672, 91 N. E. 971.

Neither judgments at law nor decrees in equity escape from the operation of the rule that fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn, transaction. Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94; on second appeal (1914) 257 Mo. 317, 165 S. W. 783.

A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, although generally conclusive between the parties to it, may be impeached and set aside if it was obtained by fraud, contrivance, or covin; the maxim that no one shall be permitted to aver against a record does not apply where fraud can be shown. Woodruff Place v. Gorman (1912) 179 Ind. 1, 100 N. E. 296.

The rule that a court of equity will not reopen a judgment of another court to enable the defeated litigant to make a defense which might have been made in the action which culminated in the judgment is subject to the important and logical qualification that he must not have been prevented by the fraud of his adversary, unmixed with his own fault or neglect, from making such defense. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

The supreme court of New Hampshire repudiated the doctrine sanctioned by some text-writers (vide, 3 Cowen & L.R.A.1917B.

Hill's Phillips, Ev. 610, note) that no party or privy to a judgment may impeach it for fraud. Tebbetts v. Tilton (1855) 31 N. H. 287.

And for reasons afterwards pronounced entirely satisfactory. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

As one jurist has put it, in the affairs of men there is no place under the sun where fraud should be permitted to take sanctuary and claim immunity from pursuit, discovery, and punishment. The solemn judgments of courts of justice of any degree afford it no sanctuary. Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365.

A decree of divorce which was obtained by fraud is voidable rather than void at the instance of the defrauded party upon a direct attack. Smithson v. Smithson (1893) 37 Neb. 535, 40 Am. St. Rep. 504, 56 N. W. 300.

A court of equity, untrammelled by restrictive legislation, has original and independent jurisdiction upon a bill filed for the purpose to set aside any ordinary judgment or decree on the ground that it was obtained through fraud practised by the successful litigant upon the defeated complainant. Ex parte Smith (1859) 34 Ala. 455; McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Evans v. Wilhite (1910) 167 Ala. 587, 52 So. 845; on second appeal (1912) 176 Ala. 287, 58 So. 262; Rittenberry v. Wharton (Ala.) supra; Tribble v. Patton (1913) 180 Ala. 258, 60 So. 863; Flood v. Templeton (1907) 152 Cal. 148, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 579, 92 Pac. 78; Davis v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462; Pearce v. Olney (1850) 20 Conn. 544; Wierich v. DeZoya (1845) 7 Ill. 385; French v. Thomas (1911) 252 Ill. 65, 96 N. E. 564; Stodgell v. Garnett (1910) 159 Ill. App. 301; Woodruff Place v. Gorman (1912) 179 Ind. 1, 100 N. E. 296; Gorman v. Johnson (1910) 46 Ind. App. 672, 91 N. E. 971; Kwentsky v. Sirovy (1909) 142 Iowa, 385, 121 N. W. 27; Boudreaux v. Lower Terrebonne Ref. & Mfg. Co. (1910) 127 La. 98, 53 So. 456; Harding v. Alden (1832) 9 Mo. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 549; Kent v. Ricards (1850) 3 Md. Ch. 396; Barr v. Packard Motor Car Co. (1912) 172 Mich. 299, 137 N. W. 697; Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310; Payne v. O'Shea (1884) 84 Mo. 129; Ellis v. Nuckols (1911) 237 Mo. 290, 140 S. W. 867; Moore v. Gamble (1852) 9 N. J. Eq. 246; Brown v. Trent (1912) 36 Okla. 239, 128 Pac. 895; Johnson v. Filtseh (1913)

37 Okla. 510, 138 Pac. 165; Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270; Wolf v. Sahm (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 120 S. W. 1114, rehearing denied in (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 572, 121 S. W. 561.

The power and right of courts of equity to set aside judgments procured by fraud, though once doubted, has long been unquestioned. Gorman v. Johnson (1910) 46 Ind. App. 672, 91 N. E. 971.

It is now "well settled." Johnson v. Filtzsch (1913) 37 Okla. 510, 138 Pac. 165.

"Well established and clearly defined." Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270.

A court of chancery has undoubtedly power to look into the judgment or decree of any court and to cancel or vacate it if it finds such judgment or decree to have been obtained by fraud. French v. Thomas (1911) 252 Ill. 65, 96 N. E. 564.

The undoubted power of a court of equity to relieve the victim of a fraud; to vacate deeds, contracts, and other instruments obtained by fraud; to undo any and all transactions hurtful to the complaining party when infected by fraud,—extends to annulling the judgments and decrees of courts which have been procured by fraud. McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534.

An attack upon a judgment for fraud in procuring it is a direct attack of which courts of equity take jurisdiction. Brown v. Trent (1912) 36 Okla. 239, 128 Pac. 895.

No well-considered case can be found, it has been said, in which the jurisdiction of courts of equity in suits attacking judgments for fraud in procuring them has been denied. Ibid.

In the absence of a statute giving a complete remedy at law, a court of equity is the appropriate forum for granting relief against fraud in the procurement of judgments. Corney v. Corney (1913) 108 Ark. 415, 159 S. W. 20.

A fraud which gave an unfair advantage to the litigant who prevailed in an action will afford ground for relief against the judgment in a court of equity. Einstein v. Strother (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 122.

A decree of divorce is, in this respect, on the same footing as other judgments and decrees; it is vitiated by fraud. Daniels v. Benedict (1892) 50 Fed. 347; Re Smith (1906) 74 Kan. 452, 87 Pac. 189; Lieber v. Lieber (1911) 239 Mo. 1, 143 S. W. 458; Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94, on second appeal (1914) 257 Mo. 317, 165 L.R.A. 1915:B.

S. W. 783; DeGraw v. DeGraw (1879) 7 Mo. App. 121; Adams v. Adams (1871) 51 N. E. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Rodgers v. Nichols (1905) 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923; Allen v. Maclellan (1849) 12 Pa. 328, 51 Am. Dec. 608; Nickerson v. Nickerson (1883) 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 210; Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100; McMurray v. McMurray (1887) 67 Tex. 665, 4 S. W. 357.

An action is maintainable to annul a decree of divorce on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and imposition practised on the court and the party against whom it was granted. Rodgers v. Nichols (1905) 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923.

The policy and letter of the law agree in guarding divorces against fraud. McBlain v. McBlain (1888) 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61; Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531.

When, by a successful fraud practised upon the court, a decree of divorce has been obtained, the courts, upon its discovery, have the right and owe the duty to the public and the party wronged of setting it aside and pronouncing it a nullity. Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27.

Upon the application of the aggrieved spouse in a direct proceeding for the purpose, a decree of divorce may be set aside, where it was procured by a fraud, in spite of a public policy adverse, as a rule, to disturbing divorces. Day v. Nottingham (1903) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

A court from which a litigant has obtained a decree in his favor by fraud and imposition will not be slow to set it aside when the injured litigant is diligent in invoking its aid to that end. Nicholson v. Nicholson (1888) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223.

The power of a court which granted by default, after a constructive service by publication, a judgment of divorce, to open it and let in the defendant to defend, has been declared to be beyond question when it is shown that the decree was obtained by fraud. Denton v. Denton (1871) 41 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 221.

A judgment or decree of divorce may be attacked and vacated for fraud in procuring it, in a court of equity. Maheer v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1901) 95 Ill. App. 365.

As a general proposition, courts of chancery have the same power to adjudge decrees of divorce null or invalid that they have in other cases of fraudulent and void judgments. Shrader v. Shrader (1895) 36 Fla. 502, 18 So. 672.

The power of the court to set aside, upon a bill in equity, a divorce obtained by fraud, has been asserted to be well settled. Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100.

The state being interested in divorce suits, courts will not sanction prosecutions fraudulently set on foot or conducted in bad faith. Olmstead v. Olmstead (1889) 41 Minn. 297, 43 N. W. 67.

Because of the interest of the state in divorce suits the courts will promptly annul decrees obtained in prosecutions fraudulently instituted, or conducted in bad faith. Ibid.

And, legislation not interfering, an original bill in equity to impeach and annul a decree of divorce may, in a proper case, be successfully maintained upon the ground of fraud in instituting and carrying on the divorce suit and procuring such decree. Golden v. Golden (1893) 102 Ala. 353, 14 So. 638; Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706; Corney v. Corney (1906) 79 Ark. 289, 116 Am. St. Rep. 80, 95 S. W. 135; Rawlins v. Rawlins (1881) 18 Fla. 345; Shrader v. Shrader (1895) 36 Fla. 502, 18 So. 672; Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795; Wood v. Wood (1906) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. In Pennsylvania the ordinary procedure to set aside a decree of divorce for fraud in obtaining it is by petition. Wilt v. Wilt (1899) 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 100.

But this method is not exclusive. Ibid.

Fraud practised in obtaining a judgment, including one for divorce, was a cause named in a statute of Iowa (Code, § 4091), for which district courts were authorized at later terms to vacate or modify judgments or grant new trials. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

A right of action in cases in which there was fraud in invoking the jurisdiction of the court or in preventing the defense of the action, to set aside a judgment, has been given by statute (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7910) in Minnesota. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

An action under the Minnesota statute to set aside a judgment alleged to have been procured by fraud has an equitable character, and the court has the power and is charged with the duty to award such relief in it as the facts and ends of justice may require in any particular case. Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310.

An agreement by a divorced wife to acquiesce in and refrain from attacking an illegal and fraudulent decree obtained against her by her husband is void, as contrary to public policy. Comstock v. Adams (1880) 23 Kan. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 191.

The general policy of Indiana is adverse to disturbing judgments of divorce for any reason but fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court, according to the view expressed in the case of Keller v. Keller (1894) 139 Ind. 38, 38 N. E. 337.

b. Nature of fraud which vitiates a divorce.

A fraud which will warrant the overturning of a judgment in any case must be an actual, intentional, and wilful one, not merely a constructive or legal fraud. Wagner v. Beadle (1910) 82 Kan. 468, 108 Pac. 859.

The nature of a fraud in procuring a judgment, to warrant relief from it in a court of equity, must be such as was the product of a bad mind and wholly inconsistent with honest purposes. Noble v. Moses Bros. (1883) 74 Ala. 604.

Fraud in the sense used to justify equitable interference with a judgment or decree has its common and direct meaning of the perpetration of an intentional wrong, or the breach of a duty growing out of a fiduciary relation. Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270.

A mere standing upon his legal rights by a plaintiff in a divorce suit does not warrant the setting aside of a decree in his favor. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576.

It is a rule sometimes spoken of as well-settled or established that the only fraud for which a court of equity is warranted in setting aside a judgment or decree is a fraud which was practised to procure that judgment or decree; a fraud in its concoction; one that brought about its rendition. Cromelin v. McCauley (1880) 67 Ala. 542; Noble v. Moses Bros. (Ala.) supra; McDonald v. Pearson (1896) 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293; De Soto Coal, Min. & Development Co. v. Hill (1914) 188 Ala. 667, 65 So. 988; Hendley v. Chabert (1914) 189 Ala. 258, 65 So. 993; Hall v. Cox (1912) 104 Ark. 303, 149 S. W. 80; Hollister v. Sobra (1914) 264 Ill. 535, 106 N. E. 507; Jones v. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County (1894) 121 Mo. 614, 26 S. W. 367; Nichols v. Stevens (1894) 123 Mo. 96, 45 Am. St. Rep. 514, 25 S. W. 578, 27 S. W. 613; Moody v. Peyton (1896) 135 Mo. 489, 58 Am. St. Rep. 604, 36 S. W. 621; Hamilton v. McLean (1897) 139 Mo. 678, 41 S. W. 224; Bates v. Hamilton (1898) 144 Mo. 1, 66 Am. St. Rep. 407, 45 S. W. 641; Fears v. Riley (1899) 148 Mo. 49, 49 S. W. 836; Lieber v. Lieber (1911) 230 Mo. 1, 143 S. W. 458; Cross v. Gould (1908) 131 Mo. App. 585, 110 S. W. 672; Springfield Traction Co. v. Dent (1911) 159 Mo. App. 220, 140 S. W. 606; Einstein v. Strother (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 122.

be vacated or enjoined must be in its procurement,—in its concoction,—in the very act itself. Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365.

A fraud which can be made the basis of an attack upon a solemn judgment of a court of record must have directly induced the rendition of the judgment, and not merely have induced or brought about a condition upon the real existence of which the court acted as the ground of its decree. Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447, and on second appeal (1909) 137 Wis. 634, 119 N. W. 878; Routledge v. Patterson (1911) 146 Wis. 226, 131 N. W. 346.

A fraud which affected only the cause of action, and which might have been met and frustrated in defending the action, affords no ground for setting aside the judgment. Einstein v. Strother (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 122.

That a cause of action was vitiated by fraud affords no ground, after a judgment has been rendered, for the interposition of a court of equity to prevent the enforcement of the judgment. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

When an alleged fraud consists only in a cause of action carried into judgment, it is not such an one as entitles the defeated litigant to impeach the judgment for fraud in its procurement. Hall v. Cox (1912) 104 Ark. 303, 149 S. W. 80.

A fraud entering into and vitiating a cause of action affords no ground in equity for relief from the judgment in the action unless the defeated litigant was prevented from defending the action and exposing the fraud. Hollister v. Sobra (1914) 264 Ill. 535, 106 N. E. 507.

A fraud which was tried in the action that resulted in a judgment is not such an one as will warrant the setting aside of that judgment. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

The judgments and decrees of courts deciding between parties before them and subject to their jurisdiction in trials where the claims of both sides have been presented and considered, although these claims may have been fraudulent, are not open to inquiry in ordinary legal ways. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

Through the protection which the law throws around rights once established by formal judicial proceedings in tribunals legally established, notwithstanding the rights thus established may be founded in fraud, they are sometimes immune to attacks by the usual and common methods. Ibid.

When everything alleged as fraud in a bill to set aside a decree of divorce was involved in the issue tendered by the defendant in the divorce suit, and was therein tried and found to be untrue, the bill cannot be maintained. Richardson v. Stowe (1890) 102 Mo. 33, 14 S. W. 810.

A fraud which entitles a party to impeach a judgment must not consist of any false or fraudulent act or testimony, the truth of which was or might have been in issue in the proceeding before the court which resulted in the judgment that is thus assailed, but it must be one extrinsic of the matter tried in the cause,—one practised upon the court in the procurement of the judgment. Bank of Pine Bluff v. Levi (1909) 90 Ark. 166, 118 S. W. 250.

If a cause of action is vitiated by fraud, such fraud constitutes a defense to be interposed to prevent a judgment or decree. Rittenberry v. Wharton (Ala.) supra.

A fraud which entered into and vitiated a cause of action is one that must be combated in the action brought upon that cause. Hollister v. Sobra (Ill.) supra.

There must be an end to litigation in the interest of the state and for the repose of society; therefore when the help of a court of equity is asked to undo what has already been done and adjudged by a court, fraud in the cause of action itself, in false allegations or false testimony, will not suffice. Such fraud was within the issues on the merits. The complainant had his day in court and the question is foreclosed. Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365.

The acts for which a court of equity will, on account of fraud, set aside or annul a judgment or decree between the same parties, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, relate to frauds extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in the matter on which the judgment or decree was rendered.

Wis.—Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447, on second appeal (1909) 137 Wis. 634, 119 N. W. 878.

It is well settled that fraud relating to transactions antecedent to a judgment, such as would have constituted a good defense to the rendition of the judgment, but not connected with the proceedings by which it was obtained, is insufficient to justify relief under the head of the equitable powers of a court of chancery. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

A wife who obtained a divorce from her husband because of a voluntary separation of the pair, continued for five years, cannot, after the husband's death and the lapse of several years, maintain an action to set aside the decree on the ground that the husband fraudulently misrepresented his property and financial condition to induce the wife to agree to articles of separation, where he neither appeared in the divorce suit nor did ought to promote the rendition of the decree. Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447.

The reason is that the separation actually took place and continued for the statutory time, regardless of whether the agreement to live apart grew out of fraud or duress; so that no fact was misstated and no imposition practised to gain the decree.

The doctrine of this case was reasserted and controlled the decision in the like case, brought for the same relief, and based upon very similar grounds, of Routledge v. Patterson (1911) 146 Wis. 226, 131 N. W. 346.

If it is established that a judgment was obtained by some extrinsic or collateral fraud by which the court rendering it was imposed upon, the judgment may be attacked and set aside. Kwentsky v. Sirovy (1909) 142 Iowa, 385, 121 N. W. 27.

Judgments and decrees are impeachable for those frauds only which are extrinsic to the merits of the case, and by which the court has been imposed upon or misled into rendering a false judgment. Rittenberry v. Wharton (Ala.) supra.

The fraud for which one may impeach a judgment taken against him must be a fraud extrinsic to the subject matter of the cause in which the judgment was rendered. Bank of Pine Bluff v. Levi (1909) 90 Ark. 166, 118 S. W. 250.

An extrinsic or collateral fraud such as justifies a court of equity in setting aside a judgment has been defined to mean some act or conduct of the prevailing party which prevented a fair submission of the controversy to the court that rendered the judgment. Electric Plaster Co. v. Blue Rapids Twp. (1910) 81 Kan. 730, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1237, 106 Pac. 1079; Garrett Biblical Institute v. Minard (1910) 82 Kan. 338, 108 Pac. 80.

c. Falsity of affidavit to obtain leave to serve process by publication in divorce suits.

A common fraud that frequently has been held to warrant, when clearly proved, the setting aside of a decree of divorce granted by default upon a service of process only constructive by publication, on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, is where the plaintiff, in order to get the authority to serve the defendant by advertisement, knowingly and wilfully made a false affidavit that the defendant's residence and whereabouts were unknown and could not with diligence be ascertained.

This fraud was conspicuous in the following cases: Shrader v. Shrader (1895) 36 Fla. 502, 18 So. 672; Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795; Whetstone v. Whetstone (1871) 31 Iowa, 276; Leathers v. Stewart (1911)

108 Mo. 96, 76 Atl. 16, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 366; Carley v. Carley (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 545; Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310; Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94, on second appeal in (1914) 257 Mo. 317, 165 S. W. 783; Britton v. Britton (1889) 45 N. J. Eq. 88, 15 Atl. 266; Voorhees v. Voorhees (1890) 46 N. J. Eq. 411, 19 Am. St. Rep. 404, 19 Atl. 172, affirmed in (1890) 47 N. J. Eq. 315, 14 L.R.A. 366, 20 Atl. 676; Dyott v. Henderson (1916) 85 N. J. Eq. 338, 97 Atl. 35; Metzler v. Metzler (1907) 132 Wis. 601, 113 N. W. 49.

That a husband suing for divorce knew the whereabouts of his wife and concealed them of purpose to prevent knowledge of the pendency of the suit from reaching her, and, in consequence, she was not notified of its pendency, and had no opportunity to appear in and defend it, is such a fraud, suppressio veri, as will justify the setting aside of a decree of divorce granted on default. Stewart v. Stewart (1911) 101 Ark. 86, 141 S. W. 193.

A false affidavit of a man petitioning for a divorce, in respect of the residence of his wife, she not being implicated, constitutes such a fraud upon the court as warrants the setting aside of the decree obtained by him upon it. Elmgren v. Elmgren (1903) 25 E. I. 177, 55 Atl. 322.

Proof that a defendant in a divorce suit had no notice of its pendency, and that the plaintiff therein, well knowing her residence, caused notice of it to be published in a newspaper which he had every reason to believe neither she nor her friends would see, of purpose to conceal from her knowledge of the proceedings, and thereupon obtained his divorce by fraud and perjury, however regular and complete may appear the record upon its face, justifies the court in setting aside the decree on defendant's motion after discovering the fraud. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

A decree of divorce granted ex parte to a wife, based upon a service by newspaper publication only, which never came to the knowledge of the husband, and was authorized by the wife's affidavit, which was false in fact, if not wilfully so, that she had used due diligence to ascertain her husband's residence and had been unable to learn it, should be set aside upon his timely application, properly made. Spinney v. Spinney (1895) 87 Me. 484, 32 Atl. 1019.

a decree of divorce obtained by her husband upon default, after constructive service of process, and for leave to come in and defend the action, it appears that the husband committed a fraud upon the court by falsely swearing to nonexistent facts upon which depended the jurisdiction of the court to entertain his action and grant the decree, the decree so obtained will be annulled in toto and the divorce action will be dismissed. Corney v. Corney (1906) 79 Ark. 289, 116 Am. St. Rep. 80, 95 S. W. 135.

This fraud is usually associated with other frauds, but always is a prominent factor in the result, when present.

In Crouch v. Crouch (1872) 30 Wis. 667, a wife was guilty of this fraud in suing her husband for a divorce where the proof was that he was merely absent from home, traveling on business, and all the time regularly and constantly corresponding with her.

In Bryant v. Austin (1884) 36 La. Ann. 808, a husband guilty of this fraud had sent his wife to visit her parents in another state, of purpose to bring suit against her for divorce, and to keep her ignorant of it by a service only constructive.

In that case, Manning, J., in concurring with his colleagues in the judgment of the court, said: "The declaration of Bryant, in answer to the question of the attorney appointed to defend his absent wife from whom he was seeking a divorce, that he did not know where she was, when he did know, would not be, to my mind, sufficient of itself and without any other circumstance to turn the scale in ordinary suits. But, in the interest of public order, I recognize that suits for divorce against absent spouses who have only technical, and not actual, notice of the existence of the suit, should be confined to the strictest rules, and that the rights of such absent defendants should be jealously guarded."

In Boyd's Appeal (1861) 38 Pa. 241, affirming Smith v. Smith (1859) 3 Phila. 489, a husband guilty of this fraud falsely charged his wife with desertion, where, with his consent and approval, she had returned to, and for two years sojourned with, her father and his family.

In Nickerson v. Nickerson (1883) 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 210, the plaintiff had sent his wife abroad to recover her health and educate their child, had corresponded with her as a loving husband, and had constantly and continually sent her money for expenses, and then, for the purpose of asserting a nominal and fictitious residence for the requisite statutory period within the territorial jurisdiction of the divorce forum, had rented lodgings which he occupied only about one night each month, and followed this by furnishing perjured testimony that his wife had wilfully deserted him.

In Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548, a husband sent his wife outside of the state, ostensibly on a temporary visit, wrote her while she was away frequent letters, now and then remitted money to her as a faithful spouse, sued her for divorce in her absence, concealed from her the pendency of the suit, and for several years the existence of the decree he had obtained, and finally misstated the jurisdiction in which he got it expressly to make her search for the record of it fruitless.

In Rodgers v. Nichols (1905) 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923, a husband guilty of such fraud was shown to have, all the time he was suing his wife for divorce, kept up a regular correspondence with her, to have visited and openly resided for a considerable time in her home as her husband, and, after getting the decree, to have continued to correspond with her as her husband until he died, and that the wife was ignorant of the proceedings until his death disclosed them, because no notice was ever mailed to her or otherwise came to her knowledge.

In Johnson v. Coleman (1868) 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193, the proof was that a husband's charge that his wife had deserted him was wilfully false, the truth being that the pair had voluntarily separated under written articles; that he knew perfectly well all the time where she resided; and that she was ignorant of the entire proceedings because the summons was never served on her, either personally or through the mails, as the law required.

In Everett v. Everett (1884) 60 Wis. 200, 18 N. W. 637, a husband guilty of this particular fraud had twice before sued his wife for divorce and both times had abandoned his suit upon her appearing to defend, and, on his third attempt, published the summons in an obscure newspaper printed in a foreign language, of purpose to conceal from his wife all knowledge of the proceedings.

In Hague v. Hague (1916) 79 Or. 646, 156 Pac. 277, a husband guilty of this fraud had deserted his wife in a distant state, and on two prior occasions had brought suit for divorce against her, making the same charges, both of which he had abandoned upon her appearing to defend, the second while disobeying an order requiring him to pay her alimony pendente lite. In that case, after the decree was set aside, a trial on the merits demonstrated that the peccant husband had no cause of action.

In Holmes v. Holmes (1874) 63 Me. 420, in addition to this fraud the plaintiff wilfully and falsely asserted that he had a domicile within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, to induce it to take cognizance of his suit for divorce against his wife, and more effectually to conceal from her its pendency.

In Wanamaker v. Wanamaker (1873) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 466, a divorce obtained by a man from his wife without notice to her, after the return nihil of the subpoena upon a service by advertisement published in an obscure place in a weekly newspaper, by direction of the libellant's attorney, of purpose to have it unseen, coupled with the omission to serve notice personally on the wife, as directed by the court, of the time and place for taking testimony before a commissioner, when all the time the wife lived in the same county, and her abode was well known to her husband, his relatives, and the neighbors, was set aside on the ground that it had been procured by fraud.

In Clay v. Robertson (1912) 30 Okla. 758, 120 Pac. 1102, the plaintiff, besides being guilty of this fraud, had designated on the record both parties to the suit by parts only of their names, and these the least known.

Allegations in a petition for setting aside a judgment of divorce rendered against the petitioner upon service by publication and default, that she departed from the state to take up her residence in a distant city by his direction and consent, upon the understanding that the two would resume housekeeping together elsewhere as soon as he could get established in business again; that she was in entire ignorance that any divorce suit was begun or contemplated until after the decree accidentally came to her notice; that the summons and complaint, if mailed at all, were purposely sent to a wrong address, when her true one was known to the husband, who wrote her upwards of three dozen letters, several of them containing remittances of money, and many of them after he had commenced suit, none containing any reference to divorcing her, are sufficient to warrant opening the judgment to admit her to defend the suit on the ground that the decree was procured by fraud.

Chaney v. Chaney (1909) 56 Wash. 145, 105 Pac. 229.

A judgment of divorce rendered in favor of a wife and awarding her all the community property, real and personal, rendered upon constructive service after official returns by sheriffs of inability to find and serve the husband within their respective counties, ought to be set aside upon the husband's petition, presented in conformity with and within the time limited by a statute in that behalf, charging that the wife knew all the time his actual residence and postoffice address in one of such counties, and fraudulently concealed it, and without imposing conditions requiring prepayment of counsel fees and alimony, where the husband has not the means to pay, and the wife is not financially needy, because the court owes it to itself to investigate the charges of fraud upon it, irrespective of the rights of the parties. Pringle v. Pringle (1909) 55 Wash. 93, 104 Pac. 135.

A fraud charged upon a plaintiff in obtaining a decree of divorce upon a service by publication, in that he swore to a wrong postoffice address of the defendant, and caused the summons and complaint to be mailed there of purpose to keep the suit from coming to the knowledge of his wife, and with intent to prevent her from appearing and defending the action, when he well knew her right address, is not established by proof that the address given by him and to which the summons and complaint were mailed had formerly been the postoffice address of the defendant, and was actually only a few miles from her residence on a farm, and that it was wrong only because a nearer postoffice had been established after the plaintiff had left the state. McDonald v. McDonald (1904) 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865.

That a plaintiff suing for a divorce falsely deposed in an affidavit to procure service by publication on the defendant that the residence of the latter was unknown to the affiant, when at the time and for a long time before it the defendant in fact actually resided in another state, is not such a fraud as warrants the setting aside of the divorce afterwards granted the plaintiff, where the statute respecting constructive service does not require the disclosure of the defendant's actual residence, and had been fully complied with so as to give all the notice required by law, because no legal injury was suffered by defendant from the false statement in the affidavit. Day v. Not-

A motion to set aside a divorce granted by default against one who actually resided without the state, upon a service made by publication only, grounded upon the charge that the statement in the plaintiff's affidavit to obtain authority to publish the summons, that the residence of defendant could not, with reasonable diligence, be ascertained, was false and amounted to a fraud upon the court, if denied upon conflicting testimony, some of which showed honest efforts, unsuccessfully made in good faith by the plaintiff to learn defendant's address, will not be granted on appeal, since it was addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and it cannot be said that such discretion was abused by the denial. Scribner v. Scribner (1904) 93 Minn. 195, 101 N. W. 163.

In Blass v. Blass (1916) — Mo. App. —, 186 S. W. 1094, a decree of divorce granted a man in Missouri from his absent wife, left behind in California, upon a service by publication only, based upon his affidavit that he did not know her address, withstood an attack by the divorced wife after the man's marriage to a second woman, his divorcee from her and marriage to a third, with whom he was living and by whom he had issue. The first wife attacked the decree on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud, in that her husband had not resided for the requisite length of time in Missouri when he brought suit, and that his charge that she had deserted him was false and supported by perjured testimony, and further, that he well knew her address in California, and misrepresented facts to procure publication and escape the mailing of process running against her. The court examined the facts and found the charges of fraud and perjury not supported by evidence. It was shown that the man had lived for the requisite statutory antecedent time in good faith in Missouri, that he left California after telling his wife he intended to reside thereafter in St. Louis, and gave her a railroad ticket to follow him there, and afterwards wrote her several letters which brought no replies, and the last of which were registered and returned undelivered. She never answered his letters nor used the railroad ticket. The proceedings in the divorce suit were regular in all respects and fully conformed to statutory requirements. The court, while holding the wife's charges not established, invoked the principle that perjury committed to obtain a judgment is no ground for setting it aside, and deemed it unnecessary to decide the point that, anyway, the right to relief was barred by the statute of limitations and laches.

A divorce obtained by a wife from her husband who deserted her and left the country several years before cannot be said to have been obtained by fraud upon the court by reason of her statement, in applying for an order for constructive service by publication upon him, that he had gone to South America, and she had no definite information as to his residence, where she afterwards recalled that he had announced a purpose to go to the capital of Brazil, and notice of the action was mailed, addressed to him at that city. Hall v. Hall (1910) 139 App. Div. 120, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

Untruthful statements in an affidavit to obtain authority to make service by publication in a divorce suit do not entitle a defendant who actually knew of the bringing and pendency of the suit, and refused to appear in and defend it, to avoid the decree granted by default. McCormick v. McCormick (1910) 82 Kan. 31, 107 Pac. 546.

A decree of divorce obtained by a man from his wife by default, upon a sworn personal service upon her of a copy of the summons and complaint, will be set aside and wholly annulled with the entire proceedings in the action for fraud, upon proof that the papers were concealed in a sealed packet, represented as containing a present for the mother of the wife, to be delivered by her unopened at the end of a long ocean voyage, handed to her on the vessel a few hours before it left port, and that the real nature of the package was not discovered until the wife was well out to sea, and at a time when it was not possible for her to return, even if she had had the necessary money for expenses, before the time to appear and answer would have expired. Bulkley v. Bulkley (1858) 6 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 307.

In Young v. Young (1871) 17 Minn. 181, Gil. 153, a decree of divorce granted a husband from his wife after she had been personally served with process, upon the ground of her adultery, was set aside because the court was of the opinion that the plaintiff's conduct amounted to a fraud upon the state and the defendant, in that she was served on the eve of her departure to Canada for medical treatment, and her whereabouts were kept secret from her parents, and during the pendency of the suit the pair kept up a friendly correspondence with each other, and the husband remitted money to his wife from time to time. And this relief was granted the wife notwithstanding she was fully aware all the time of the purpose of the husband to prosecute the suit for divorce, and his intention never again to live with her, and her admission that the charge that she had committed adultery was true, and where the only defense she set up was that her adultery had been committed with the connivance of her husband, and that he had condoned her fault.

A wife divorced by default while absent in Europe with her husband's consent may, on her return home, and at a later term of court, have the decree set aside on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and surprise, where in fact she had no actual knowledge that a suit for divorce had been brought against her, notwithstanding she had been personally served with process by a deputy sheriff on the eve of her departure, upon proving that her knowledge of the English language was too imperfect for her to comprehend the meaning of what was read to her, and that she was told by her husband, when she asked of him what it meant, that it amounted to nothing. Gechter v. Gechter (1878) 51 Md. 187.

The conduct of a husband in sending his wife to a foreign land and leaving her there destitute, for the fraudulent purpose of obtaining a divorce from her in a suit which she was thus prevented from defending, coupled with the delivering to her, along with the summons, of a written promise to pay her a stated alimony if a decree was granted him,—a promise which he had no intention of keeping, and which she was led to think a part of the judicial proceeding,—and in deceiving her into believing that because she had borne no children, her barrenness constituted a legal ground of divorce; and then, after her departure, in alleging and proving by false testimony, upon her default, that she was impotent,—amounts altogether to such fraud in procuring a judgment of divorce as will suffice to sustain an action by the wife, seasonably brought, to set aside the decree. Colby v. Colby (1894) 59 Minn. 432, 50 Am. St. Rep. 420, 61 N. W. 460.

An abortive service by mail, under an order for the publication of a summons in a divorce suit brought against a non-resident of the state whose home address was well known, not in fact effected because the plaintiff fraudulently omitted to prepay the postage, with intent that the defendant should be kept in ignorance of the pendency of the suit, is such a fraud practised upon both the defendant and the court as requires the decree granted by default to be annulled in a direct action brought for the purpose by the defendant. Morton v. Morton (1891) 16 Colo. 358, 27 Pac. 718.

The fact that a defendant was imprisoned in a state prison under a sentence for a term of years when personally served with process in a divorce suit affords no ground for setting aside a decree of divorce granted by default in the suit upon an application for such relief, made immediately after the prisoner's discharge, unaccompanied by any proof of a deprivation of any legal and meritorious defense. Phelps v. Phelps (1838) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 150.

A defect in the affidavit of service of summons and complaint upon the defendant in a divorce suit does not warrant setting the decree aside in a case where the record shows indubitably that they were actually personally served. Robertson v. Robertson (1880) 9 Daly (N. Y.) 44.

That a wife against whom her husband by regular proceedings was granted a divorce was ignorant and illiterate will not suffice to support her action to annul the decree, where she understood the purpose of the summons served upon her, and the husband took no advantage of her ignorance and illiteracy to impose upon her. Miller v. Bearb (1914) 134 La. 893, 64 So. 822.

The motion of a literate and intelligent woman to open a judgment of absolute divorce entered against her by default, unsupported by any affidavit of merits, unaccompanied by any proposed answer, or any denial of the truth of the charges of her misconduct in the complaint, grounded only upon the general statement that she has a good and valid defense, without setting forth what it is, and the excuse for her default that the person who served her with process told her to throw the papers away, as her husband was only "bluffing," is properly denied. Maguire v. Maguire (1902) 75 App. Div. 534, 78 N. Y. Supp. 312, O'Brien, J., dissenting.

e. Fraudulent concealment of pendency of divorce suit from defendant spouse.

If a defendant never had knowledge of a pending action or suit, and was kept in ignorance of it by the conduct of the plaintiff until judgment was rendered against him, the fraud is such as will sustain a new suit to vacate and annul the judgment. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

A decree obtained through a resort to an actual intentional artifice to prevent the party against whom it was rendered from having any knowledge of the pendency of the suit is properly set aside, on the ground that it was procured by fraud. Frisbie v. Chase (1913) 161 Iowa, 133, 140 N. W. 842.

To conceal from the defendant spouse the pendency of a suit for divorce, and, while keeping her in absolute ignorance, to procure an attorney to appear in it and represent her without her knowledge or authority, renders the decree obtained voidable for fraud at the instance of the injured spouse. Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1880) 55 Cal. 384.

Notwithstanding a public policy averse, as a rule, to disturbing judgments of divorce, a decree of divorce may be set aside on the application of an aggrieved spouse in a direct proceeding for that end where the applicant was kept in ignorance of the pendency of the divorce suit by the trickery of the adversary. Day v. Nottingham (1902) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

A husband's conduct after sending his wife out of the state to visit her relatives in temporarily sojourning in a neighboring county where he was not so extensively known, for the express purpose of gaining a colorable residence to bring suit for divorce; his false representation and affidavit to procure substituted service upon her by publication; his concealment from her of all knowledge of the pendency of the divorce suit, while all the time he was in friendly correspondence with her; his manufacturing of testimony and falsification of the report of it as grounds for divorce,—all together constitutes such a gross fraud on his part in procuring the divorce as to constrain the court, upon the application of the wife, seasonably made after learning the facts, to set aside and annul the decree. Whitcomb v. Whitcomb (1877) 46 Iowa, 437.

A decree of divorce entered by default after a service by publication only will be set aside by the court which rendered it upon a petition presented at a subsequent term, setting up fraud in its procurement, where the fraud alleged is admitted by demurrer or established by proof, and consists in an imposition upon the court to induce it to take jurisdiction, and a concealment of the pendency of the proceedings to prevent an appearance and defense. Edson v. Edson (1867) 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393.

In the absence of any inhibitory legislation a court of equity, upon a bill by a wronged wife, filed for the purpose, is warranted in setting aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband in ex parte proceedings by means of a gross fraud upon her by sending her out of the state and keeping her in ignorance of the suit, and preventing her from appearing and defending herself against unfounded charges. Mansfield v. Mansfield (1858) 26 Mo. 163.

A husband who sends his wife and child to Europe; accompanies them on and pays the expenses of the journey to the port of departure; buys their tickets for the ocean passage; promises soon to join them on the other side; returns home and begins suit for divorce upon the alleged ground that she has deserted him; has service made by publication only; keeps corresponding with her all the time as if faithful,—is guilty of such fraud in obtaining a decree as warrants a court of equity in setting it aside upon the suit of the wife, brought with diligence after she learned the facts. Tollefson v. Tollefson (1908) 137 Iowa, 151, 114 N. W. 631.

A case made by a plaintiff wife in an action to set aside a divorce obtained against her by her husband, showing that while he resided in a place where both parties were well known, and where the bringing of a divorce suit by either could not possibly be kept from the knowledge of the other, he, for the fraudulent purpose of keeping her ignorant of the proceedings, went into another jurisdiction, began by substituted service and prosecuted a suit for divorce, and obtained a decree by default, based on charges which were untrue, and which he knew to be false,—various facts and circumstances being established which tended to show his bad faith and intent to deceive both his wife and the courts,—prima facie entitles her to relief, and is, at all events, good upon a general demurrer by him to the evidence. Crow v. Crow (1914) 40 Okla. 455, 139 Pac. 122.

f. Fraudulent institution and prosecution of divorce suit by one spouse in name of the other.

to set aside judgments of courts of law which were obtained by fraud extends to the setting aside of a judgment rendered in favor of the complainant through the defendant's fraud. Barr v. Packard Motor Car Co. (1912) 172 Mich. 299, 137 N. W. 697.

It is a fraud alike upon the wife and the court for a husband, anxious to be divorced, to bring and prosecute a suit against himself in the name, but without the knowledge, of his wife, and the decree thereby obtained will summarily be set aside upon due application. Olmstead v. Olmstead (1889) 41 Minn. 297, 43 N. W. 67.

A husband who procures a suit for a divorce to be instituted against himself in the name of his wife, but without her knowledge or consent, and then appears and facilitates the entry of a decree, commits such a fraud upon her and the court as warrants a court of equity in annulling the divorce judgment. Brown v. Grove (1888) 116 Ind. 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 823, 18 N. E. 387.

The charge that a divorce suit brought and prosecuted to judgment in the name of a wife, against her husband, was instituted without her authority, consent, or knowledge, and hence that the decree granted in it was obtained by fraud, and ought, for that reason, to be set aside, is not sustained by such clear and satisfactory proof as is always required in such cases, when the wife's testimony to her alleged ignorance of the entire proceedings has been squarely contradicted by the attorney who acted in her behalf, and he has been corroborated by documentary evidence over her signature of the payment to and acceptance by her of alimony awarded her by the decree. Ellis v. White (1883) 61 Iowa, 644, 17 N. W. 28.

A wife cajoled and bribed into bringing suit to annul her marriage by the false representation of her husband's attorney, confirmed by the advice of her own, that her marriage was invalid for lack of a preliminary license, may have the judgment obtained therein by suppressing and keeping from the knowledge of the court that rendered it vital facts establishing the validity of the marriage, set aside. Davidson v. Ream (1916) 97 Misc. 89, 161 N. Y. Supp. 73.

g. Acts and conduct which prevent defenses of divorce suits as fraud.

There is an admitted exception to the general rules of law framed to promote social repose in cases where the successful litigant has done something whereby there was in fact no real adversary trial or decision of the issue in the action or suit. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

Equity will interfere in behalf of one against whom a judgment has been rendered who had a good defense to the action, but no opportunity to make it, because he was prevented from presenting it by the fraud or misconduct of his adversary. Pearce v. Olney (1850) 20 Conn. 544; Davis v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 444, 132 Pac. 462; Kent v. Ricards (1850) 3 Md. Ch. 396.

Any intentional act or misconduct in one who has brought an action or suit, designed and having effect to prevent his adversary from making a defense, amounts to a fraud warranting a court of equity in setting aside the judgment or decree obtained. Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136; Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1880) 55 Cal. 384; Young v. Young (1871) 17 Minn. 181, Gil. 153.

If an unsuccessful litigant has, by his opponent's fraud or deceit, been prevented from fully exhibiting his case, so that no real trial or hearing was had, he may maintain a new suit to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree, and open the case for a new and fair hearing. United States v. Throckmorton (U. S.) supra.

A court of equity may disregard or enjoin the enforcement of an unconscionable judgment for new causes such as fraud, accident, or mistake, which deceived or misled the court into making a wrong decree, or which prevented the beaten litigant from putting in a meritorious defense that was not presented to the court which rendered the judgment. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

A spouse prevented by the trickery of the other spouse from appearing in and defending a divorce suit may, in a direct proceeding for the purpose, have a decree of divorce which was granted therein set aside despite a public policy averse, as a rule, to disturbing divorces. Day v. Nottingham (1902) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

A spouse who, by fraud, was persuaded to refrain from defending a divorce suit, has sufficient ground to support a bill in equity to set aside the decree therein granted by default. Scanlan v. Scanlan (1890) 41 Ill. App. 449.

The act of the successful party in keeping the unsuccessful one away from court when the action was tried, so that no real contest took place, is such a fraud as will entitle the defeated litigant to maintain a suit to set aside and annul the judgment or decree. United States v. Throckmorton (U. S.) supra.

A decree of divorce obtained ex parte by a man from his wife upon a ground wholly fictitious, and by fraudulently inducing her not to defend, will be set aside summarily upon the petition of the wife, presented as soon as the facts were discovered by her, notwithstanding the time to appeal from the decree has passed. Jones v. Jones (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 558, 89 Atl. 29, and on second appeal (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 571, 91 Atl. 819.

A husband who assures his wife that process served upon her in his suit for divorce as she is about temporarily to leave the country with his consent, on a business journey, is meaningless and unimportant, and who thus forestalls her appearing and defending, commits a fraud upon her which entitles her, in proper proceedings and upon due plea and proof of the facts, upon her return, to set aside a decree divorcing her by default while she was absent abroad. Gechter v. Gechter (1878) 51 Md. 187.

The conduct of a husband in procuring a decree of divorce through persuading his wife, while she was sojourning in another state, to sign a written waiver of service of summons and a consent to submit the cause for trial, in reliance upon his promise not to use them without giving her notice in advance and an opportunity to appear and defend herself, constitutes such a fraud in obtaining a decree in violation of his promise, and through an attorney employed by him to appear for the wife, as warrants a court in setting the decree aside. McDonald v. McDonald (1913) 175 Mo. App. 513, 161 S. W. 850.

An allegation in a petition for a new trial under the Iowa Statute (Code, § 4091) authorizing the court to vacate a judgment for fraud, averring the concealment and misrepresentation by the prevailing party of certain facts peculiarly within his knowledge, which, if known to and established by the defeated party, would have brought about a contrary result, is sufficient on demurrer. Griffith v. Merchants' Life Asso. (1910) 148 Iowa, 727, 127 N. W. 1079.

A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be attacked and set aside on the ground that the defeated litigant was misled by the statements of his adversary, and thereby prevented from making his defense, unless there were good reasons why he should have been misled. Penn. v. McGhee (1908) 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686.

Relief by virtue of the Minnesota statute, (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7910), giving a right of action to set aside a judgment obtained by fraud which prevented a defense, depends upon the application of equitable principles. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

h. Promises of plaintiff to abandon suit for divorce.

A judgment obtained by a fraudulent promise and misrepresentation of the plaintiff to the defendant, which induced the latter not to appear and answer in the suit, will not be permitted to stand. Lawrence v. Lawrence (1911) 145 Ky. 61, 140 S. W. 36.

For a husband who has brought suit for divorce to lead his wife to believe that he will not prosecute it, and thereby to induce her, in reliance upon his assurances, to refrain from defending, is such a fraud in obtaining the decree he afterwards takes without giving her notice and opportunity to contest as entitles her to maintain a bill in equity to set aside the judgment. Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136.

An assurance of a husband to his wife that he has abandoned, or a promise by him to her that he will have dismissed, a suit for divorce which he had brought against her, made of purpose to lead her to refrain from defending, and believed and relied upon by her, she in consequence not defending the suit, amounts to a fraud in obtaining a decree of divorce afterwards granted to him which entitles her to have it set aside upon a prompt and proper application for such relief. Scanlan v. Scanlan (1890) 41 Ill. App. 449; Nicholson v. Nicholson (1887) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223; Jones v. Jones (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 571, 91 Atl. 819, affirmed in (1915) 84 N. J. Eq. 479, 93 Atl. 580.

This is only an application to divorce suits of a doctrine applying to judgments generally.

A false representation by a husband to his wife that a suit for divorce which he had brought against her had been discontinued and abandoned, made of purpose and having the effect to prevent her from appearing and defending, because she believed and relied upon his statements, constitutes a fraud sufficient to sustain her suit to set aside the decree obtained by the husband. Sampson L.R.A.1917B.

When a defeated litigant was induced by a false promise of compromise by his adversary to keep away from the trial and refrain from contesting, the deception will sustain a new suit to set aside and annul the judgment in the old one. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

An actual fraud in procuring a judgment such as will constitute ground for relief in equity by bill to set aside such judgment has been practised by the party who obtained it when, by his divers promises and agreements, which he never intended to perform, he has induced the other party to refrain from interposing a defense to the action which resulted in such judgment, and to suffer it to be taken by default. Flood v. Templeton (1907) 152 Cal. 148, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 579, 92 Pac. 78.

An application to set aside a verdict and judgment alleged to have been obtained by a fraud practised on the defendant, and for leave to come in and defend, made at the same term of court, supported by allegations of diligence, a meritorious defense, and readiness for instant trial on the merits, and by testimony that the plaintiff was a son of a codefendant sued as partner of the applicant, in whose presence and with whose implied consent the father represented and promised that the action would be withdrawn and definitely abandoned, thus inducing the applicant to refrain from defending, and that the claim was unfounded, is properly granted. Moore v. Moore (1913) 139 Ga. 597, 77 S. E. 820.

It is a fraud on the defendant, entitling him to relief through a bill in equity from a judgment taken against him by default, after the plaintiff had promised to and assured him that he would dismiss the case, and had thereby induced the defendant to refrain from defending it. Wierich v. DeZoya (1845) 7 Ill. 385.

A promise by a plaintiff to dismiss his action against the defendant, upon which the latter relies, and which induces him to refrain from making a defense, is such a fraud in procuring a judgment as entitles him to maintain a bill in equity to set the judgment aside. Stodgell v. Garnett (1910) 159 Ill. App. 301.

Promises and agreements respecting future acts, made as inducements to acquiesce in a decree settling amounts and terms of payment and security for alimony, intelligently comprehended at the outset, not subsequently kept, and, even if never meant to be kept, do not constitute such a fraud as will support a bill in equity to set aside the decree. Van Sickle v. Harmeyer (1912) 172 Ill. App. 218.

A defendant who had a good defense and purposed to make it to an action brought against him, but refrained from interposing it because the conduct of the plaintiff's attorney led him and was intended to lead him to believe the suit had been abandoned and would not be prosecuted, will be relieved in equity from a judgment taken against him for want of a defense. Pearce v. Olney (1850) 20 Conn. 544.

The promises of the attorney for the plaintiffs, made to the defendant upon receiving from him security for the payment of the claim in suit, not to prosecute the action further, and to withhold the entry of judgment; his further promise to vacate the judgment taken if defendant objected to it, coupled with assurances to refrain from enforcing it until the security obtained had been exhausted and a deficit had resulted, upon which promises and assurances the defendant had in good faith relied, so that he took no proceedings either to prevent the judgment or to set it aside, constitute sufficient grounds for the interposition of a court of equity to stay the collection and prevent the enforcement of the judgment. Kent v. Ricards (1850) 3 Md. Ch. 396.

The violation of an agreement of counsel to continue a pending case by taking a judgment in the absence of his adversary, who was relying upon such agreement, would, if proved, amount to a fraud which would justify setting the judgment aside. Beck v. Jackson (1911) 160 Mo. App. 427, 140 S. W. 919.

A judgment obtained by a plaintiff without notice to the defendant, and in violation of an honest agreement between the parties that the trial of the cause should be adjourned, should be set aside on the ground that it was procured by a fraudulent breach of faith. Binsse v. Barker (1832) 13 N. J. L. 263, 23 Am. Dec. 720.

When the trial of a case in which a good defense has been pleaded is, upon agreement and motion of the attorneys for both parties, continued beyond the term, by order of the court, and, in reliance upon the continuance, the defendant, his counsel and witnesses, had left L.R.A. 1917B.

the court room for their homes, a judgment taken at such term by the plaintiff in the defendant's absence, and without his knowledge, by inducing the court to set aside the order for continuance, will be set aside by a court of equity upon a bill brought for the purpose. Evans v. Wilhite (1912) 176 Ala. 287, 58 So. 262.

The taking of a judgment for divorce in violation of an agreement by counsel for the spouse who got it amounts to a fraud which justifies setting the decree aside, irrespective of whether or not the client knew aught of the agreement or its breach. McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

The breaking by counsel in a divorce suit, in order to take a decree out of turn, and without notice to his adversary, of an oral agreement he had made respecting the procedure, constitutes a fraud which may warrant the setting aside of the decree despite the fact that such agreement could not have been enforced, because unwritten. Ibid.

A statement by counsel for a plaintiff that his client desires the case to be dismissed, and may give any direction he sees fit, does not constitute a fraud sufficient to warrant setting aside the judgment, because it does not excuse the defendant from either defending the action or procuring it to be formally dismissed. Penn v. McGhee (1908) 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686.

It is no ground for setting aside, on motion, a decree of divorce granted in an action in which issue had been joined by an answer demanding affirmative relief, that the plaintiff's attorney served a notice of dismissal, when afterwards, upon stipulation of both parties, the cause was restored to the trial calendar. La Fond v. La Fond (1907) 102 Minn. 344, 113 N. W. 896.

Any deception practised by a party to a divorce suit on the court in which it is brought or pending, in any matter affecting its jurisdiction, or its discretion to proceed or not to the final determination of the cause, is sufficient to invalidate a decree of divorce on the ground that it was procured by fraud. Dunham v. Dunham (1896) 162 Ill. 589, 35 L.R.A. 70, 44 N. E. 841, affirming (1895) 57 Ill. App. 475.

Nothing is more clearly settled, according to the Maine supreme court in Holmes v. Holmes (1874) 63 Me. 420, than that the court has power and the right to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by fraud and imposition upon the court and the injured spouse.

The concealment from a court to whom application is made for a decree of divorce by the applicant that a prior action has been brought and is pending against her at her domicile to dissolve her marriage is such a fraud upon the second court as will invalidate its decree. Dunham v. Dunham (Ill.) supra.

When the adulteries of a wife upon which her husband grounds his action for an absolute divorce were committed in carrying out a conspiracy between him and her paramour, and by his consent, connivance, procurement, and privity, he is barred of legal redress, and the decree which he gets is vitiated by a fraud on the court, and it will be set aside when the facts become known. Helmes v. Helmes (1898) 24 Misc. 125, 52 N. Y. Supp. 734.

A judgment annulling a marriage granted in an action where the court was misled by the suppression of vital facts, done either of purpose to achieve a result different from what would have been produced had they been presented, or else under an innocent but mistaken belief that they would not affect the result, warrant the setting of the judgment aside for fraud practised upon the court, which, had it known the whole truth, would not have rendered the judgment. Davidson v. Ream (1916) 97 Misc. 89, 161 N. Y. Supp. 73.

When a fraud has been perpetrated upon the court to induce it to take jurisdiction where it in fact has none, of the parties to a divorce suit, an original bill may be filed later by the wronged party to set aside and annul the divorce granted in such suit. Fritz v. Fritz (1899) 9 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 275.

The rule established in Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482, and approved in Neil v. Neil (1883) 38 Ohio St. 558, and Knapp v. Thomas (1883) 39 Ohio St. 377, 48 Am. Rep. 462, that a decree of divorce granted by a court which had jurisdiction, even by substituted service which gave in fact no notice, although obtained by a fraud and false testimony, cannot be set aside on an original bill filed at a later term, is limited to cases where there was jurisdiction, and does not apply where the court was cheated into taking jurisdiction when it had none. "In Parish v. Parish (Ohio) supra," said the court, "it is expressly found that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties. In the case at L.R.A.1917B.

bar there was no case before the court of which it might take jurisdiction. A decision of that case, while it may be, not having been reversed, authority for the proposition that when a court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties the decree taken in a divorce case will not be set aside by reason of the fraud of either, yet it is not authority for the proposition, however broad its language, that a court has no power to set aside a decree for divorce obtained by fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court."

A right of action, not absolute, but depending upon equitable principles, to set aside a judgment procured by a fraud in invoking the jurisdiction of the court, has been conferred by a Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7910). Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

XVIII. Duress as ground of attack on divorces.

In sundry judicial opinions, duress as a ground for annulling a judgment has been bracketed with fraud. Thus it has been said that a fraud or duress, if practised in the very act of obtaining a judgment, justifies setting that judgment aside. Pfaffner v. Krapfel (1869) 28 Iowa, 27; Whetstone v. Whetstone (1870) 31 Iowa, 276; Cowin v. Toole (1871) 31 Iowa, 513; Warthen v. Himstreet (1900) 112 Iowa, 605, 84 N. W. 702.

And further, that a fraud or duress which warrants the setting aside of a decree or judgment must have been such an one as really prevented the unsuccessful litigant from having a trial. Kwentsky v. Sirovy (1909) 142 Iowa, 385, 121 N. W. 27.

The association is justified by several decisions respecting decrees of divorce, in some of which the decrees have been overthrown, and in the others, which escaped, duress was a recognized good ground of attack.

The bringing of a suit for divorce against a wife by her husband, and the taking of a decree therein on the ground of desertion, by her assent, procured by his paid agents' solicitation at a time when she was in ill health and greatly enfeebled in mind and body, and upon payment to her of a sum of money direly needed for her temporary support, followed by a judgment of divorce on false charges of adultery, of which she was kept in ignorance, amounts to such fraud and duress in obtaining the decree as will justify a court of equity in annulling it on those grounds. Daniels v. Benedict (1892) 50 Fed. 347.

A bill in equity to set aside and annul a decree of divorce obtained by a husband may be maintained by the wife, upon proof that she never had any notice of the suit, and that during its pendency, at the instigation of the husband, she was kept in prison and under duress until after he had succeeded in obtaining the decree, so that she had no opportunity to appear and defend. Golden v. Golden (1893) 102 Ala. 353, 14 So. 638.

That a wife was compelled to waive service of the summons in her husband's divorce suit by threats and intimidation while a physical and mental wreck, under treatment in a hospital, affords ground for relief in equity from a decree of divorce obtained by him upon false charges, supported by perjured testimony, while she was incapable of making a defense. Butler v. Butler (1912) 34 Okla. 392, 125 Pac. 1127.

A decree of divorce granted to a husband, for the alleged adultery of his wife, where the action was undefended on the merits because, at his solicitation, she signed, unread, a letter prepared by him to an attorney he had selected, and whom she never knew or met, which directed that an answer be filed in the case, and nothing more, the signing being induced by his threats to withhold support and his promises to pay her a large sum of money and deal justly by her, she being destitute of means, and where the fact that she was charged with marital infidelity was carefully concealed from her,—must, upon her petition to set aside the decree, be considered to have been granted and enrolled in circumstances which justified the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, in vacating it. Galloway v. Galloway (1915) 125 Md. 511, 94 Atl. 97.

In a suit by a former wife to set aside a divorce granted to her husband in an action wherein she was represented by counsel, but which she did not contest, founded upon allegations that she was coerced to refrain from defending by false charges of adultery threatened to be proved by perjured testimony, and not presented, so that the decree should rest, as it did, upon mutual dislike, incompatibility of temper, and antagonistic tastes and habits, making life together too burdensome to be borne,—the husband has a right to show that she had been guilty of adultery, or at least that there was such strong evidence of her guilt as to justify an honest belief of it which he entertained, in order to L.R.A.1917B.

negative her allegations of false charges and threatened perjury, and consequently of any legal coercion or duress. Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

Coercion and duress which will sustain an attack upon a judgment of divorce by the spouse subjected to it must be such as brought about the rendering of the decree, and not simply such as created a condition the real existence of which was the ground of that decree. Uecker v. Thiedt (1909) 137 Wis. 634, 119 N. W. 878.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to set aside a judgment rendered in the complainant's own favor through the misconduct of the defendant. Barr v. Packard Motor Car Co. (1912) 172 Mich. 299, 137 N. W. 697.

Hence, a wife who may have been coerced, constrained, and intimidated into suing her husband for divorce, and deceived, cajoled, and imposed upon also by him, may, after a decree is granted, have it set aside in a proper case in a court of equity.

The court will, upon motion by a wife, set aside a decree of divorce granted her against her husband when it is shown that she was induced by fraud, deceit, and duress on his part to bring the action against him, and that he supplied the testimony and furnished proof of his own infidelity to be freed from her. Lake v. Lake (1908) 124 App. Div. 89, 108 N. Y. Supp. 964.

A wife unduly influenced, constrained by duress, and imposed upon by her husband to bring suit and obtain a divorce from him, may afterwards, by original action or supplemental petition, in the same court, have the decree set aside and its provisions respecting alimony revised and enlarged. Holt v. Holt (1909) 23 Okla. 639, 102 Pac. 187.

A petition to the court, presented by a woman against the executors of her former husband, alleging that a decree of divorce from her on the ground of adultery, granted to the testator in his lifetime in a suit begun by him a dozen years before, was obtained by fraud on his part, with her collusion, induced by duress, and praying that the decree be set aside and annulled, should be dismissed for her laches in presenting it, if for no other reason, when it appears that she was regularly and personally served with process at the outset, that she appeared to defend and filed a cross bill, that she agreed to accept a money payment in lieu of defending, and purposely suffered default; that, repudiating her agreement, she again appeared by leave of the court to defend, and again suffered a default, in consideration of a sum of money paid her; and that, during a period of two years, she was living in another state, free from any possible duress. Re Brigham (1900) 176 Mass. 223, 57 N. E. 328.

In a contest by a divorced wife with the widow by a subsequent marriage of her husband as to who of the twin should be appointed administratrix of his estate and share therein as widow, evidence offered to impeach and avoid the decree of divorce granted the former, that she had been forced by duress consisting of ill treatment, abandonment, and withholding of means to procure the necessities of life, which made her no free agent, to bring and prosecute the suit, is properly excluded. Re Ellis (1893) 55 Minn. 401, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am. St. Rep. 514, 56 N. W. 1056.

A wife who, after appearing by an attorney in a suit brought for divorce by her husband, abandons her defense in consideration of his withdrawing charges of adultery made against her and taking a decree upon less objectionable grounds, and settling her claims upon his property by the payment and acceptance of money and property aggregating several thousands of dollars in amounts and values, cannot, after the lapse of several years, maintain an action to set aside the divorce as fraudulently obtained, in that she was coerced into abandoning her defense and accepting an inadequate settlement by false charges of adultery, threatened to be supported by perjured testimony. Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

Allegations by a former wife that she was urged, cajoled, and persuaded by her husband to sue him for divorce through an attorney employed and paid by him, upon his representation that his business interests required and would be promoted by their judicial separation, coupled with threats to flee the state in case of refusal, and promises to remarry in a few months after she obtained a decree, do not establish a case of fraud and duress, in the absence of any showing that her mental or physical state was not normal, that will warrant a court in setting aside a decree obtained by her, but simply make out a plain case of collusion, for which she, as a guilty party, is not entitled to any relief. Robinson v. Robinson (1914) 77 Wash. 663, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 534, 138 Pac. 288.

That a wife was coerced and constrained by duress to agree with her husband upon articles of separation, and deceived by him in respect of the value and amount of his property, so that she accepted an inadequate sum in settlement of her claims for alimony and upon her husband's estate, will not support her action, brought after his death and her discovery of the truth, to set aside a divorce she obtained from her husband in an undefended suit grounded upon the separation. Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447, on second appeal (1909) 137 Wis. 634, 119 N. W. 878.

Routledge v. Patterson (1911) 146 Wis. 226, 131 N. W. 346, in which a judgment of divorce was attacked on similar grounds, followed this decision.

A woman against whom a decree of divorce has been granted by an imposition of her husband upon her weakness and credulity may later attack the judgment and prove that she was imposed upon and deceived to such an extent that she did not really stand in court as a defendant at liberty to exercise her rights. O'Rourke v. Lawrence (1913) 132 La. 710, 61 So. 764.

XIX. Accident or mistake as ground for relief from divorces.

Accident or mistake which prevented a beaten litigant from making a defense when he had one of merit, or which misled the court into making a wrong judgment, are among the causes for which it is said a court of equity will relieve from an unconscionable judgment. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

An accident, misfortune, or mistake, if unavoidable and not due to negligence, in consequence of which, by preventing a defense, a judgment or decree was taken, affords ground in equity for setting it aside at the suit of one who diligently seeks to be relieved. Renfro Bros. v. Merryman (1881) 71 Ala. 195; Weems v. Weems (1882) 73 Ala. 462; Waldrom v. Waldrom (1884) 76 Ala. 285; Evans v. Wilhite (1910) 167 Ala. 587, 52 So. 845, on second appeal (1912) 176 Ala. 287, 58 So. 262; Morton v. Morton (1887) 117 Cal. 443, 49 Pac. 557; Clark v. Ramsey (1915) 143 Ga. 729, 85 S. E. 869; Miller v. Barto (1910) 247 Ill. 104, 93 N. E. 140; Kent v. Ricards (1850) 3 Md. Ch. 396; Foxwell v. Foxwell (1912) 118 Md. 471, 84 Atl. 552, on second appeal (1914) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494; Whitlock Cordage Co. v. Hine (1915) 125 Md. 96, 93 Atl. 431; Galloway v. Galloway (1915) 125 Md. 511, 94 Atl. 97;

Payne v. O'Shea (1884) 84 Mo. 129; Cantwell v. Johnson (1911) 236 Mo. 575, 139 S. W. 365; Ellis v. Nuckols (1911) 237 Mo. 290, 140 S. W. 867; Einstein v. Strother (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 122; Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Scripture v. Scripture (1893) 70 Hun, 432, 24 N. Y. Supp. 301; Bowsman v. Anderson (1912) 62 Or. 431, 123 Pac. 1092, 125 Pac. 270; McMurray v. McMurray (1887) 67 Tex. 665, 4 S. W. 357.

Although in Maryland, as a general rule, a final decree may be revised, annulled, or reversed after enrollment only by a bill of review or one impeaching it for fraud, there is a recognized exception where a cause has not been heard on the merits, and the aggrieved litigant petitions to set aside the decree, charging that it was entered by mistake, surprise, or in circumstances which satisfy the court that it should be vacated. Foxwell v. Foxwell (1912) 118 Md. 471, 84 Atl. 552, on second appeal (1914) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494; Whitlock Cordage Co. v. Hine (1915) 125 Md. 96, 93 Atl. 431; Galloway v. Galloway (1915) 125 Md. 511, 94 Atl. 97.

District courts in Iowa were authorized by statute (Code, § 4091) to vacate or modify judgments (divorce decrees included) and grant new trials at subsequent terms for unavoidable casualties or misfortunes which prevented the prosecution or defense of the action, and for other stated causes. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

XX. Attacks on collusive divorces.

Collusion between husband and wife to get divorced really constitutes a fraud upon the court before which they bring the suit.

All judgments and decrees, it has been said, may be vacated for collusion properly pleaded and proved. Harding v. Alden (1832) 9 Me. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 549.

When facts are brought to the attention of the court which granted a divorce, showing it to have been obtained by collusion, the court should investigate and determine the truth of the charge, to the end that the decree may be either vacated or confirmed. E. B. v. E. C. B. (1858) 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 44.

Both the letter and the policy of the law concur in guarding divorce suits against collusion. McBlain v. McBlain (1888) 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61; Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531.

Any divorce obtained by collusion will L.R.A.1917B.

be set aside upon a seasonable and proper application, for reasons of public policy. Singer v. Singer (1863) 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 139.

The courts annul collusive decrees of divorce on grounds of public policy when seasonably applied to in good faith, untainted by an expected personal advantage to the applicant. Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706.

A collusive divorce will be set aside in the interest of the state when brought to the knowledge of the court. McIntyre v. McIntyre (1894) 9 Misc. 252, 30 N. Y. Supp. 200.

Because of the interest of the state in suits for divorce the courts never sanction those collusively instituted, and promptly annul decrees obtained by collusion. Olmstead v. Olmstead (1889) 41 Minn. 297, 43 N. W. 67.

A collusive decree of divorce obtained pursuant to a corrupt agreement between the parties to suppress evidence which, if disclosed, would have led the court to refuse such decree, will be promptly annulled. Winder v. Winder (1910) 86 Neb. 495, 125 N. W. 1095.

A decree of divorce obtained by a husband pursuant to a collusive agreement with his wife which he persuaded her to enter into by misrepresentations and promises to give her an opportunity to defend will be annulled by the court when brought to its attention in the wife's suit to set the decree aside as having been fraudulently obtained, because a collusive divorce is contrary to public policy. McDonald v. McDonald (1913) 175 Mo. App. 513, 161 S. W. 850.

A decree of divorce granted ex parte and pro confesso, without hearing any evidence to establish the truth of the charges made in the complainant, after defendant's answer has been stricken out for failure to set up any defense, is properly set aside and annulled on motion by defendant showing collusion. True v. True (1861) 6 Minn. 458, Gil. 315.

It is error in a court to refuse to vacate a decree of divorce and admit the spouse against whom it was granted to come in and defend the suit, upon an application made at the same term, and based upon indubitable evidence of a collusive agreement between the litigants that no resistance should be made, in consideration of a money payment. Danforth v. Danforth (1883) 105 Ill. 603.

Although a collusive agreement between husband and wife to be divorced, when no breach of marital duty had been committed, would be a fraud upon the court, which could not be judicially sanctioned, yet, a judgment of divorce alleged to have been procured by collusion will not be set aside unless the collusive agreement is clearly proved. Hopkins v. Hopkins (1875) 39 Wis. 167.

The courts will refuse to grant a decree of divorce when collusion appears, but they do not necessarily set aside decrees collusively obtained after a long time has elapsed, at the instance of one of the parties to the corrupt agreement. Hubbard v. Hubbard (1893) 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170.

Neither of the guilty parties to a collusive decree of divorce is entitled, as a matter of strict right, to set it aside on the ground of collusion. Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706.

A spouse who obtained a divorce on grounds which did not exist, pursuant to a collusive agreement to suppress the truth, cannot have it set aside. Robinson v. Robinson (1914) 77 Wash. 663, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 534, 138 Pac. 288.

No public policy requires the setting aside of a decree of divorce collusively obtained, after several years have elapsed and an innocent third person has married the divorced spouse, and would suffer distress or disgrace by the annulment of the decree. Singer v. Singer (1863) 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 139.

A divorce obtained by a man through the co-operation and collusion of his wife in suppressing facts and presenting false testimony will not be set aside at her suit after a year of delay by her, knowing he had, in the meantime, married another woman. Karren v. Karren (1902) 25 Utah, 87, 60 L.R.A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815, 69 Pac. 465.

A divorce obtained by a collusive agreement not to defend the suit, in consideration of a promise to pay money, never kept, will not be set aside in equity after the lapse of five years and the marriage of the spouse who obtained it to another. Whittle v. Whittle (1908) 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078.

A decree of divorce obtained through collusion, corruptly and intelligently entered into for a promised money payment, will not be interfered with on the score of public morals, at the instance of an unrepentant spouse, cheated out of the base reward. Hubbard v. Hubbard (1893) 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170.

A decree of divorce will not be set aside upon a petition which discloses merely that it was the outcome of collusion between the parties, for in such a case the court will leave the parties as it found them, and will hold them bound by the collusive decree. Newman v. Newman (1910) 27 Okla. 381, 112 Pac. 1007.

The petition of a husband to vacate a decree of divorce obtained against him by his wife, awarding her alimony and the custody of the children, which alleges that although he had a good defense, he refrained from making it, and agreed to allow her to take a decree in reliance upon broken promises by her and her attorney to waive all claim for alimony and upon his property, must be dismissed, because, on its own showing, the decree was collusive, and courts do not relieve against collusion for the mere sake of property rights. Erdman v. Erdman (1914) 43 Okla. 172, 141 Pac. 965.

A judgment of divorce obtained by a woman from her husband, to which she was legally entitled, will not be set aside because of collusion between her attorney and the defendant, to which she was no party, and of which she had no knowledge. Harft v. Harft (1883) 16 N. Y. Week. Dig. 461.

A divorce obtained by a woman from her husband, pursuant to a collusive agreement between the pair by which he employed an attorney to bring a suit for her against him, will not be set aside afterwards on his application. Moor v. Moor (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 63 S. W. 347.

A collusive decree of divorce obtained by testimony as to grounds which in fact did not exist will not be set aside at the instance of the spouse who procured it, and who would not have got it if the truth had been told. Robinson v. Robinson (1914) 77 Wash. 663, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 534, 138 Pac. 288.

A wife who obtained from her husband, pursuant to an agreement with him, a divorce, to qualify her to testify in his behalf as a witness upon his trial for crime, relying upon his promise to remarry her when all was over, and in so doing deceived her attorneys and the court in the divorce suit, cannot, because the husband broke his promise and married another woman, have the decree set aside. Henderson v. Henderson (1916) 32 N. D. 520, 156 N. W. 245.

A mere agreement to compromise and settle the pecuniary and property interests and issues involved in a divorce, made by husband and wife, who dealt with each other at arm's length, each through independent and adverse counsel acting and advising their respective clients in good faith, and careful to avoid any collusion, respecting the dissolution of the marriage, is not contrary to public policy nor any ground for setting aside a decree of divorce subsequently granted in the suit. Hudson v. Hudson (1914) 176 Mo. App. 69, 162 S. W. 1062.

An agreement by a wife not to oppose her husband's suit for divorce if he would withdraw charges of adultery and pay her a stated sum of money is not a ground of opening the decree he obtained by performing the conditions in full. Neely v. Neely (1884) 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 201.

The statute of North Dakota defining collusion in a divorce case (Rev. Codes 1905, § 4058) as an agreement between husband and wife that one of them shall commit, or appear to have committed, or be represented in court as having committed, acts constituting grounds for divorce, for the purpose of enabling the other to obtain a divorce, is not violated when, in an adversary action, the wife consents, in consideration of a substantial payment of money for her support and maintenance, to abandon her defense and allow the husband to prove his case if he can. Wiemer v. Wiemer (1911) 21 N. D. 371, 130 N. W. 1015.

In an action by a divorced wife to recover dower as if her former husband were actually dead, in lands owned by him during coverture, where the record of the divorce disclosed that alimony had been agreed upon by the parties and paid by the husband to the wife, the husband cannot be permitted to impeach the validity of the decree of divorce on the ground that it was granted the wife by his collusion, through which the court was imposed upon and led to grant a judgment in violation of statute. Davis v. Davis (1873) 61 Me. 395.

One who comes into a court of equity seeking relief against a judgment must enter, as in other cases, with clean hands. A decree of divorce will never be set aside for fraud in procuring it, by a court of equity, at the suit of one who was guilty of the fraud. Van Slyke v. Van Slyke (1915) 186 Mich. 324, 152 N. W. 921.

Upon the well-settled principle that in a court of justice one cannot complain of a wrong done by himself or of a wrong done by another in which he was a partaker, one cannot attack a decree of divorce upon the ground that it was obtained through a fraud committed by himself. Dow v. Blake (1893) 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761.

One who was himself a party to a fraud in obtaining a judgment will not be heard in proceedings to set it aside L.R.A.1917B.

on account of that fraud. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

A divorce procured by a fraud upon the defeated spouse cannot afterwards be successfully attacked by the person or by anyone in privity with the person who perpetrated the fraud, on the ground that it was obtained by a fraud. Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1880) 55 Cal. 384.

The application of a man to set aside a decree of divorce obtained against him by his wife, pursuant to their collusive agreement, by which he employed an attorney to get it for her, will be denied for his own fraudulent participation. Moor v. Moor (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 63 S. W. 347.

A decree of divorce will not be set aside at the instance of the spouse who obtained it, after several years of acquiescence, upon the ground that the court which granted it was imposed upon in respect of the residence of the parties, where the applicant to vacate it was a participant in the imposition, if any was practised. Ferry v. Ferry (1894) 9 Wash. 239, 37 Pac. 431.

XXI. Attacks based on condonation pending the divorce suit.

A husband bringing suit for divorce, who continues during its pendency to cohabit with the defendant wife, all the time telling her that he had dropped his suit, is guilty of such a fraud in obtaining the decree as entitles the wife to have it set aside in an appropriate proceeding brought by her for the purpose. Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84.

If a husband, during the pendency of his action for a divorce, renews his marital relation and cohabits again with his wife, assuring her that he has abandoned the action, and afterwards takes judgment against her for want of a defense, she is entitled to maintain a bill in equity to set aside the decree on the ground of a condonation of the alleged cause of action upon which it was founded. Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136.

A husband who obtains a decree of divorce by default while living and cohabiting with his wife and deceitfully assuring her that all would be well, and persuading her to refrain from appearing and defending his suit, commits such a fraud as entitles the wife to relief in a proper proceeding in a court of equity to nullify the decree. Rawlins v. Rawlins (1881) 18 Fla. 345.

Testimony proving that a husband, after bringing a suit for divorce against his wife, assured her that he would not prosecute it, and that, while it was pending, the parties lived together and occupied the same bed as before, although contradicted, is sufficient to sustain a decree in equity setting aside, at the instance of the wife, a divorce against her on the ground that it was procured by fraudulently persuading her not to defend. Scanlan v. Scanlan (1890) 41 Ill. App. 449.

When a divorce on the ground of desertion has been obtained by a man from his wife without notice to her and without her knowledge, and the facts prove beyond dispute that her absences from home were with his consent and approval, that while she was away he kept up more or less regularly a friendly correspondence with her, and that he resumed and continued, for considerable periods of time, marital relations with her, the decree is properly set aside at her instance. Fidelity Ins. Co.'s Appeal (1880) 93 Pa. 242, affirming Peterson v. Peterson (1878) 6 W. N. C. 449.

A divorce will not be granted to a spouse who sues for it on the ground of adultery and then condones the offense by resuming marital relations with the guilty spouse; and if a husband seeking a divorce from his wife condones her offenses and again cohabits with her after a hearing of his suit has been had and a decree nisi granted, the decree will not be made an absolute one, but, instead, will be set aside, and his suit will be dismissed. Krussman v. Krussman (1910) 2 Boyce (Del.) 25, 78 Atl. 642.

A final decree of absolute divorce in favor of a man, against his wife, will be set aside on proof that, after he had obtained an interlocutory decree, and before the entry of the final one, he condoned the offense of the wife by voluntarily taking her back to his home and cohabiting with her as her husband. Cary v. Cary (1911) 144 App. Div. 846, 129 N. Y. Supp. 444.

Cohabitation between husband and wife during the pendency of his suit against her for divorce is a sufficient reason for her belief that he had abandoned the suit, and a justification for her not appearing to make a defense. Faulkner v. Faulkner (1916) 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404.

To warrant, however, the setting aside of a decree of divorce on the ground that, during the pendency of the suit for it, the husband condoned his wife's offenses by cohabiting with her, and thus leading her to think he had abandoned the suit, the alleged cohabitation must be fairly proved; and when the wife admits that it did not take place, her attack on the decree obtained by her husband, grounded upon a supposed condonation, necessarily fails. Ibid.

The circumstance that a husband continued, during the pendency of his suit for divorce, to live at the common home of himself and wife, where he occupied a separate room apart from her, does not prove a fraud or deception upon his part inducing her to believe that the suit had been abandoned, and operating to prevent her from appearing and defending it. Ibid.

Condonation by a wife of cruel and inhuman treatment by her husband affording sufficient cause for divorce, so as to defeat her action, cannot be established by proof merely that, after the offenses were committed, and until she brought suit, she continued to live with her husband, without additional evidence of a reconciliation and express forgiveness. Morton v. Morton (1897) 117 Cal. 443, 49 Pac. 557.

That, during the pendency of a divorce suit brought by the wife against the husband for his fault, she condoned his offenses by again cohabiting with him as before, while constituting a reason for refusing her a decree if pleaded and proved in defense, affords no ground for setting aside a decree obtained by her after a hearing and verdict, and after the husband remarried and died, at the instance of his son by his first wife, in a contest with his second wife over the administration of his estate. McLeod v. McLeod (1915) 144 Ga. 359, 87 S. E. 286.

In a suit for divorce on the ground of adultery, condonation is a defense to be set up to prevent a decree, and it is not sufficient to support a bill in equity to set aside the decree four years after it was granted. Watkinson v. Watkinson (1904) 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 Ann. Cas. 326.

In an action brought four and a half years after a divorce was granted, and after a new marriage on the faith of it had been entered into by the spouse who obtained it, by the former husband, against the divorced wife, based upon an alleged fraud, inducing a belief in the plaintiff that the wife had abandoned her suit, predicated upon an occasional and intermittent cohabitation while the couple were continuously living separate and apart in different homes, to set aside the decree, wherein no meritorious defense was satisfactorily shown, no representation that the suit had been or promise that it would be dismissed was made, no fraud of any sort until after the husband had been three months in default was asserted, the husband is legally charged with notice of the decree and with negligence in asserting his supposed right to have it annulled, and therefore should be denied relief, on account of laches. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

XXII. Adultery of plaintiff as ground for relief from a divorce.

Evidence that a man who, in petitioning for a divorce from his wife, falsely averred that he had always been a kind and affectionate husband, was then living in open adultery with another woman, whom he afterwards married, warrants the court in setting aside the decree granted him, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and deceit. Kellow v. Kellow (1886) 1 Lehigh Valley L. Rep. (Pa.) 202.

It is held that when a defendant has once been admitted to defend a divorce suit opened under the Virginia statute (Code, § 3233) after judgment without personal service or appearance, it is legal error to refuse permission, in the absence of any showing of negligence, to amend the cross bill so as to set up recent and additional adulteries of the plaintiff. Willard v. Willard (1900) 98 Va. 465, 36 S. E. 518.

A wife sued by her husband for divorce, and personally served with process in the action, who has a good defense in the criminal intimacy of the husband with another woman, and knows it in ample time to set it up in answer, is negligent to such an extent in not doing so as to estop her from obtaining as a right an annulment of the decree after it has been granted. Faulkner v. Faulkner (1916) 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404.

A charge that the spouse who obtained a divorce had been guilty of adultery and of secretly cohabiting with a third person, named as a co-conspirator in prosecuting the divorce suit, which might have been, but was not, set up as a defense, and which, if established, would have prevented the granting of the divorce, affords no ground for setting aside the decree. Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

A wife suing in equity to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband after he had resumed marital relations with her, and fraudulently persuaded her to refrain from defending by belief in his assurances that he would abandon his action, shows a meritorious L.R.A. 1917B.

defense sufficient to maintain the bill when the testimony establishes wrongdoing in both spouses, justifying a divorce for either if innocent, under the well-settled principle that no relief will be granted to either party when both are equally at fault. Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136.

A stipulation by a wife, withdrawing her answer in a divorce suit by her husband, under the persuasions of her seducer, whom the husband had employed for the purpose of debauching her, will be vacated upon her application, and the decree obtained by her husband upon default will be annulled, and leave will be given to her to defend the action for the purpose of showing that the adultery which he charges her with was committed with his consent, connivance, privity, and procurement. Helmes v. Helmes (1898) 24 Misc. 125, 52 N. Y. Supp. 734.

A decree of divorce in favor of a wife, granted her because of her husband's adultery, clearly established, will not be set aside on the ground that she was an adulteress in marrying another man and living with him as his wife, under a sincere belief that previously she had been legally divorced from her former husband. Robertson v. Robertson (1880) 9 Daly (N. Y.) 44.

XXIII. Misconduct of counsel for defeated spouse as ground for relief from divorce.

If an attorney regularly employed to represent the beaten party in an action or suit corruptly sold out his client to the successful adversary, the defeated litigant may have the judgment or decree set aside in a new suit. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

A wife whose attorney, without authority, and in violation of his duty, withdrew her answer and suffered a judgment to be taken against her by default in her husband's divorce suit, has a legal right to have the decree set aside and the case opened for defense upon her motion, promptly made, for that relief. Nichells v. Nichells (1895) 5 N. D. 125, 33 L.R.A. 515, 57 Am. St. Rep. 540, 64 N. W. 73.

A wife living in the home established by her husband in another state, sued for a divorce, and asserting a full and complete defense on the merits, who immediately on receiving a copy of the summons and complaint through the mails, pursuant to an order of publication, consults an attorney at her home, and through him employs local counsel to defend the suit, and diligently instructs him in time, is entitled to have set aside on motion, under the provisions of the Montana statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 116), a decree of divorce granted her husband by default, due to the abandonment of her defense and refusal longer to act for her of the counsel she had retained to represent her because she would not assent to a settlement respecting alimony which he had arranged. Simpkins v. Simpkins (1894) 14 Mont. 386, 43 Am. St. Rep. 641, 36 Pac. 759.

The fact that the attorney for a wife who really was too ill to attend the trial of her husband's suit for a divorce from her and make a defense did not, when asking a postponement of the trial for that reason, present legal proof of her illness, is not a sufficient reason for denying her motion, seasonably and diligently made, to open the case and be heard. Henderson v. Henderson (1903) 83 App. Div. 449, 82 N. Y. Supp. 444.

The sudden illness of counsel employed to defend an action, provided it was unknown to the defendant, which prevented him from making the defense, may be deemed such an accident or misfortune as will warrant opening a judgment taken against the defendant by default. Clark v. Ramsey (1912) 138 Ga. 727, 75 S. E. 1128.

The discretion of a court of equity has been exercised to open a decree of divorce obtained by a husband from his wife upon slight evidence and her failure to answer, through the neglect or misfortune of her counsel, when she had a good defense, where neither the interest of the public nor innocent third persons could be affected, there having been no remarriage, notwithstanding the wife was chargeable with laches and a willingness to refrain, for a consideration from opposing her husband's suit. Richardson v. Richardson (1904) 67 N. J. Eq. 437, 58 Atl. 820.

A litigant does not meet the requirement of diligence necessary to be shown in order to set aside a judgment taken against him for want of a defense by proof that he employed an attorney to defend and the latter failed him, but he must go beyond that and prove that he himself did everything he could do to hold his attorney to his duty. Clark v. Ramsey (1915) 143 Ga. 729, 85 S. E. 869.

That the deposition of a material witness for the defense had not been filed, and hence was unavailable to the defendant at the trial, which resulted in a judgment against him, constitutes merely an oversight of counsel, and affords the defendant no sufficient ground for attacking such judgment as having been taken by surprise, mistake, or accident. Blood v. Beadle (1880) 65 Ala. 103.

Mere negligence of counsel in defending a divorce suit, where they are not corrupt, is insufficient to authorize a court of equity to vacate the decree. Corney v. Corney (1910) 97 Ark. 117, 133 S. W. 813.

The negligence of an attorney for one of the parties to a divorce suit in not notifying his client of the time set for trial of the action, when the adverse party is in no wise responsible for the neglect, does not afford a ground for setting aside the decree. Winstone v. Winstone (1905) 40 Wash. 272, 82 Pac. 268.

The failure of counsel for a defendant wife in a divorce suit to take the depositions of her witnesses because of lack of money to defray the expense; or to either apply for a court order requiring the husband to furnish the needed money, or for leave to submit oral testimony, for the purpose of establishing recriminatory charges, is mere negligence of counsel; and when unaccompanied by proof that they deliberately and corruptly betrayed their client, not a fraud, surprise, accident, or mistake such as will sustain a bill of equity to set aside the divorce decree. Corney v. Corney (Ark.) supra.

An error of judgment by an attorney, or a misunderstanding of his client's wishes in consenting to dismiss an appeal, does not amount to a fraud upon the client which will sustain a suit to set aside a judgment of divorce. Meisenheimer v. Meisenheimer (1909) 55 Wash. 32, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1005, 104 Pac. 159.

A court of equity will not disturb a judgment of a court of law because an accident or misfortune or a mistake concerning the proper practice prevented the taking of an appeal from it and a review of it by an appellate court. Van Gilder v. Ringer (1911) 163 Ill. App. 105.

If an attorney, without authority or fraudulently, assumed to act for an unsuccessful litigant, and connived at his defeat, such litigant may for that reason maintain a suit to set aside and annul the judgment or decree rendered against him. United States v. Throekmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

It is not a ground for setting aside a decree of divorce obtained by a wife from her husband after personal service on him on the ground of his adultery, which he confessed but avoided by asserting a condonation of his offense, that the solicitor who appeared in his behalf and upon the taking of proofs acted without his authority, where neither the wife nor her solicitor had any act, part, or knowledge in the unauthorized appearance. Hoffmire v. Hoffmire (1838) 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 173 affirmed in (1838) 7 Paige, 60, 32 Am. Dec. 611.

A wife's denial of the authority of her attorney of record to appear for her in her husband's divorce suit is not sustained where she personally verified her answer and knew the purpose of the suit. Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

XXIV. Newly discovered evidence as ground for opening decrees of divorce.

If, after a decree of a court of chancery has become final, new evidence is discovered, a bill of review on that ground provides a remedy. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

If evidence has been discovered since a trial and judgment, which would, if presented, have had a material bearing upon the result, appropriate relief may be had by a motion for a new trial. Ibid.

While a litigant may be bound to know what facts are in issue so as to be prepared on a trial to prove or disprove the cause of action or defense, he is not bound to know what witnesses will be called by his adversary, nor whether or not they are qualified to testify; and hence cannot be charged with negligence in not discovering before judgment the incompetency of the only witness called to sustain his opponent's cause of action, and who falsely testified to his own competency. Wood v. Wesley (1912) 75 Misc. 521, 135 N. Y. Supp. 876, affirmed in (1912) 151 App. Div. 897, 135 N. Y. Supp. 1150.

An application of the beaten litigant to open a divorce suit for the purpose of submitting additional evidence all the time in the applicant's possession and known to be needed should be denied. Smith v. Smith (1907) 72 N. J. Eq. 5, 65 Atl. 986.

A court of equity will not set aside a judgment or decree for the purpose of letting in newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative, and which, if admitted, would not be of controlling effect. Woodward v. Donovan (1912) 167 Ill. App. 503.

When a wife has defended her husband's suit for divorce on account of her cruel and abusive treatment of him by L.R.A.1917B.

setting up condonation in an act of marital intercourse at a stated time, by him denied, with other evidence supporting his denial, and the court, after hearing both sides fully, and considering the conflicting evidence, has found as a fact that the asserted condonation never took place, and has granted the husband a decree nisi, the circumstance that afterwards, at a date consistent with the alleged condoning intercourse, the wife gave birth to a child said to have been thereby begotten, while warranting the court in reviewing the whole case upon a subsequent application to make the decree nisi an absolute one, does not, as a matter of law, give rise to a conclusive presumption of error in finding there had been no condonation. Koffman v. Koffman (1906) 193 Mass. 593, 79 N. E. 780.

That a statute enacted after a decree of divorce had been regularly granted without any fraudulent taint removed the disqualification of parties in divorce suits to testify as witnesses in their own behalf, to disprove the charges against them, affords no sufficient ground for setting aside a decree of divorce granted a husband for the adultery of his wife, in order that she might testify to her innocence. Holbrook v. Holbrook (1874) 114 Mass. 568.

XXV. Attacks grounded on lunacy of divorced spouse.

An unjust and unconscionable judgment taken in a suit begun and prosecuted against a defendant of unsound mind and so physically infirm as to be unable to attend court will, where the incapacity, mental and bodily, continued until his death, be set aside at the suit of his administrator. Southern Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. Ford (1913) 151 Ky. 476, 152 S. W. 243. "It would be monstrous," said the court in that case, "to say that a man whose mental and physical condition was such as to prevent him from appearing and making defense should be bound by the terms of a plainly unjust and unconscionable judgment against him."

A motion to set aside a decree of divorce grounded upon allegations of inhuman cruelty, granted to a husband for default of an answer, against a wife who, within a month afterwards, was judicially adjudged insane, made by her guardian, should be granted on grounds of public policy and as an act of justice to an unfortunate lunatic. Cohn v. Cohn (1890) 85 Cal. 108, 24 Pac. 659.

A court of chancery, upon a bill filed by the legal representative of the person and estate of an insane woman, will set aside and annul a decree of divorce from her husband, granted in a suit brought and prosecuted in her name at a time when she was a lunatic, under treatment for her mental disease in an insane asylum in another state, wholly irrespective of the question of whether or not the divorce proceedings were instituted in her behalf by her friends, or fraudulently connived by her husband to obtain his own freedom from the bonds of matrimony, on the all-sufficient ground that the insanity of the wife deprived her of legal capacity to sue for or consent to a divorce. Bradford v. Abend (1878) 89 Ill. 78, 31 Am. Rep. 67.

A decree of divorce obtained by default, after constructive service, by a husband from an insane wife whom he had committed to an asylum without the state, is void because she is not a non-resident, and is under his control, incapable of appearing and defending herself. Newcomb v. Newcomb (1877) 13 Bush (Ky.) 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222.

A petition to set a divorce aside, averring that the petitioner, the wife, was, when the suit was begun, while it was pending, and when the decree was made, a physical and mental wreck by the acts of her husband, under treatment in a hospital, and incapable of making her defense, which was complete and meritorious; that the charges against her were not true, and were sustained by false testimony, and that she had been compelled to waive service of the summons by force, threats, and intimidation, —sets forth good grounds for the relief sought. Butler v. Butler (1912) 34 Okla. 392, 125 Pac. 1127.

A divorce granted in one state in regular proceedings conforming to all the statutory requirements, to a man from his insane wife, cannot be successfully attacked and overthrown in an action by ejectment in another state, brought by the lunatic's guardian after the death of the husband and the lapse of more than twenty-five years, during which he had been married to and raised a family of children by another woman. Miller v. Miller (1913) 89 Kan. 151, 130 Pac. 681.

A delay by a wife who was personally served with the summons and complaint in her husband's suit for divorce, of fourteen years, in seeking an annulment of the decree he had obtained by fraud and false testimony, where he had died in the interval and she had for nine years known that the decree had been granted, L.R.A.1917B.

is such laches on her part as to bar her from any relief, notwithstanding she was, most of the time, mentally deranged, and claimed to have been to the very last ignorant of the fraud and perjury charged. McElrath v. McElrath (1913) 120 Minn. 380, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, 139 N. W. 708.

For errors in proceedings against lunatics which do not appear on the record, or when the lunacy does not so appear, an Iowa statute (Code, § 4091) which is held to embrace divorce suits authorizes district courts at later terms to vacate or modify judgments or grant new trials. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

A lunatic divorced in Nebraska through a fraud was, when the lunacy was not disclosed by the record, given a remedy by virtue of a statute (Civ. Code, § 602) held to embrace divorce suits, which empowered district courts to vacate or modify their judgments or orders after the terms had expired, for errors in the proceedings. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

An action in equity, where there is no adequate remedy at law, affords the only remedy to set aside a decree of divorce, valid on its face, entered upon default, without any personal service, against a defendant who had been adjudged a lunatic before the suit was brought, and who was actually insane while it was pending, and when the decree was granted. State ex rel. Happel v. District Ct. (1908) 38 Mont. 166, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1098, 129 Am. St. Rep. 636, 99 Pac. 291.

XXVI. Attacks grounded on infancy of divorced spouse.

Errors in proceedings against minors when such errors or the minority do not appear on the record afford, with others, a cause by the Iowa statute (Code, § 4091), which embraces divorce suits, for district courts at later terms to modify or vacate judgments or grant new trials. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

An infant divorced by fraud in Nebraska, if the infancy did not appear on the record, was given a remedy by a statute (Civ. Code, § 602) authorizing district courts to vacate or modify, after the expiration of their terms, their judgments or orders, for errors in the proceedings. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24

Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

A divorce granted against an infant wife cannot be set aside upon the application of her mother, upon the allegation that it was collusive, and asking to be appointed guardian ad litem to defend the suit. E. B. v. E. C. B. (1858) 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 44.

XXVII. Attacks on divorces resting upon infirmities of pleadings in divorce suits.

a. False averments in initial pleading of suit for divorce.

Evidence which demonstrates the entire falsity and wholly fictitious character of the alleged cause of action to annul a marriage for alleged fraud, duress, and want of consent, will sustain a bill in equity to set aside a decree of divorce granted without notice other than constructive to the defendant. Doughty v. Doughty (1876) 27 N. J. Eq. 315.

It, however, has been doubted whether the mere fact of knowingly bringing an unfounded action for divorce is such a fraud on the court that the decree rendered in it must be set aside as one procured by means of a fraudulent act, practice, or representation, within the meaning of the pertinent Minnesota statute. McElrath v. McElrath (1913) 120 Minn. 380, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, 139 N. W. 708.

A statement by a man in his petition for a divorce from his wife that he had at all times demeaned himself as a kind and affectionate husband, shown to have been wilfully false, by proof that he was then living in open adultery with another woman, whom he later married, justifies setting aside the decree granted him as fraudulently obtained. Kellow v. Kellow (1886) 1 Lehigh Valley L. Rep. (Pa.) 202.

Allegations of desertion, shown to be false, in one case by proof that there had been a voluntary separation under written articles, and in another that the defendant's absence from home was merely temporary, while traveling on business, where divorces were obtained by default after merely constructive services by publication, authorized upon affidavits wilfully false respecting the abode and unknown whereabouts of the defendants, have been held to warrant the setting aside of decrees on the ground that they were obtained by fraud. Johnson v. Coleman (1868) 23 Wis. 452, L.R.A.1917B.

99 Am. Dec. 193; Crouch v. Crouch (1872) 30 Wis. 667.

A like decision has been made where, upon charges of desertion, a divorce was granted by default to a husband after a service only constructive, by publication, and based upon his wilfully false affidavit of ignorance of his wife's residence, where the proof showed that she had merely returned to her father's home, with the consent and approval of her husband. Boyd's Appeal (1861) 38 Pa. 241, affirming Smith v. Smith (1859) 3 Phila. 489.

The fact that the averments in a petition for a divorce were untrue does not warrant the setting aside of a decree granted by default upon a constructive service by publication where the defendant had actual notice of the bringing and pendency of the divorce action, and deliberately declined to appear and defend. McCormick v. McCormick (1910) 82 Kan. 31, 107 Pac. 546.

b. Defects in initial pleadings in divorce suits.

A complaint in a divorce suit sufficient to inform the court and the defendant what relief is demanded and the facts upon which the claim to that relief is based is good enough to give the court jurisdiction of the subject matter. Re James (1893) 99 Cal. 374, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, 33 Pac. 1122.

According to several decisions, a decree of divorce will not be set aside because the initial pleading in the suit omitted allegations which it should have contained.

A court of equity will not interfere with a judgment of divorce rendered by a court which had complete jurisdiction, simply because the petition for divorce did not contain the allegation that the application was made in good faith, notwithstanding such an allegation was by law mandatory in such cases. Mengel v. Mengel (1909) 145 Iowa, 737, 120 N. W. 72, 122 N. W. 899.

An objection in an action respecting property the title to which depends upon the validity of a decree of divorce previously granted, that the complaint in the divorce suit did not state facts sufficient to warrant a dissolution of the marriage, is not well founded, and does not make the decree unavailable as void, because the court which granted it necessarily adjudged the complaint good, and its ruling cannot be reviewed in a later and independent action. McFarlane v. Cornelius (1903) 43 Or. 513, 73 Pac. 325, 74 Pac. 468.

A decree of divorce granted to a man in his lifetime, from his wife, on the ground that she had deserted him, cannot be successfully attacked and avoided in a suit by her, claiming to be his lawful widow, to establish her alleged homestead right in certain lands of which he died seised, and based on the theory that the court which granted the divorce was not authorized to do it because there was no averment that the desertion charged was "without reasonable cause." Rush v. Moore (1877) — Tenn. —, 48 S. W. 90.

A judgment will not be set aside for defects in the pleadings which were curable by amendment of a verdict, and were not pointed out before the judgment was rendered. Penn v. McThee (1908) 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686.

Irregularities and defects in a petition for divorce which might have been corrected by the court to which it was presented, and which did not affect the court's jurisdiction, afford no ground for setting aside the decree. Gelwicks v. Gelwicks (1913) 160 Iowa, 675, 142 N. W. 409.

The omission in a petition for divorce of an averment required by positive statute respecting the residence in good faith within the jurisdiction of the petitioner does not nullify a decree subsequently granted her which is regular upon its face, and was rendered after the defendant had appeared generally, and made no objection to the form of the petition, there being no pretense of either fraud or collusion in the case. Richardson v. King (1912) 157 Iowa, 287, 135 N. W. 640.

The fact that a husband suing for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii on the ground of his wife's desertion did not set forth in his bill that the wife previously had procured in the state to which she fled a divorce a mensa et thoro from him, constituting a ground of defense or a bar to his suit, does not constitute such a fraud as to invalidate the decree he afterwards obtained. Harrison v. Harrison (1851) 19 Ala. 499.

Forasmuch as a court of competent jurisdiction, having regularly obtained jurisdiction of the parties, may rightfully grant an absolute divorce upon the ground of adultery, where the couple have previously been divorced a mensa et thoro on the ground of desertion, the fact that, in a husband's suit for divorce from his wife on account of her alleged adultery, he did not disclose to the court that she had previously been granted a limited divorce from him on the ground that he had abandoned her, does not render the decree obtained by him a nullity. Foxwell v. Foxwell (1912) 118 Md. 471, 84 Atl. 552.

But when subsequently, upon the petition of the wife to open the last decree, and for leave to defend the suit, it is established that the court which granted it had no knowledge of the prior decree, and that its existence was wilfully concealed from the court, a proper case of fraud on the court is made out which warrants granting the prayed-for relief. Foxwell v. Foxwell (1914) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494.

A wife is not aggrieved in a legal sense by the provisions in a decree of divorce granted her husband by default, after personal service of process upon her, which award her alimony and a share of his property, so as to obtain by appeal a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the complaint of the husband did not ask for any relief respecting alimony and a division of his estate. Lessig v. Lessig (1908) 136 Wis. 403, 117 N. W. 792.

Divorce being in Missouri entirely a statutory proceeding, the failure of the plaintiff to set forth in the petition the facts respecting the residence of the parties and the locus of the offense charged, which the statute requires to be stated therein, is fatal to the validity of the decree when directly attacked by a motion in arrest of judgment. Robinson v. Robinson (1910) 149 Mo. App. 733, 129 S. W. 725.

The case is otherwise when the decree is collaterally attacked on this ground in a suit by a second spouse to annul his marriage. Werz v. Werz (1881) 11 Mo. App. 26.

c. Omitted verifications to initial pleadings in divorce suits.

A chancery rule forbidding a default regularly entered in a divorce case to be opened after six months have elapsed from the personal service of process on the defendant does not apply to a decree of divorce granted by default upon a bill the oath to which omitted the allegation required by a mandatory statute of the nonexistence of collusion, since, in the absence of such an averment, a default cannot be regularly taken, and hence may be set aside in a proper case at any time. McWilliams v. Lenawee Circuit Judge (1905) 142 Mich. 226, 105 N. W. 611.

A divorce granted by default after a constructive service by publication, to a wife who, being under age, prosecuted the suit by a guardian or next friend, has, however, been held void because the affidavit which a statute mandatorily required to be appended to petitions in divorce cases to the effect that the facts stated in them were true and that the complaint was not made out of levity, by collusion, under constraint or fear, merely to obtain a separation, but was made in sincerity and truth, for the causes stated, was not made and sworn to by the wife in person but by the next friend or guardian instead, for the reason that she alone, and not he, knew the real truth respecting the facts mentioned in the statute. Hinkle v. Lovelace (1907) 204 Mo. 208, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730, 120 Am. St. Rep. 698, 102 S. W. 1015, 11 Ann. Cas. 794.

In the last case the court cited McCraney v. McCraney (1857) 5 Iowa, 254, 68 Am. Dec. 702, and referred to it as a case which sustained the doctrine that a statute requiring allegations of absence of collusion, etc., in petitions for divorce or their verifications, was not so mandatory as to make the failure to comply with it fatal to a decree of divorce. The cited decision was criticized by the Missouri court as follows: "This case is against the great weight of authority in this country, and it seems to us to be against the letter and spirit of our statute upon the subject in hand, and is contrary to sound public policy, and for these reasons we refuse to follow it."

The failure of one suing for a divorce to verify her petition, pursuant to a mandatory statute, will not invalidate a decree obtained by her after her husband had appeared and failed to object that the petition was unverified. Richardson v. King (1912) 157 Iowa, 287, 135 N. W. 640.

XXVIII. Errors and irregularities of procedure in divorce suits as bases of attack.

In matrimonial suits in courts of equity if the substantive rights of the parties are protected, methods of procedure are largely discretionary with the trial court, and a strict conformity to rigid rules is not essential. Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795.

A court of equity cannot review a judgment at law to correct legal errors committed in rendering it. Van Gilder v. Ringer (1911) 163 Ill. App. 105.

Matter which shows only that a judgment was erroneous will not support an action to annul it. Boudreaux v. Lower L.R.A.1917B.

Terrebonne Ref. & Mfg. Co. (1910) 127 La. 98, 53 So. 456.

There is a remedy by writ of error when a court has been mistaken in the law in rendering a judgment; and if, in a court of chancery an erroneous decree has been made, an opportunity to correct the error is offered by an appeal to a higher tribunal. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

A judgment merely erroneous will not be set aside by a court of equity, neither will a court of equity disturb a judgment simply because it was irregular. Cantwell v. Kimmerle (1913) 179 Ill. App. 66.

Errors and irregularities in practice in a divorce suit, even if grave enough to require a reversal of the decree on appeal, do not invalidate that decree upon a subsequent collateral attack. Re James (1893) 99 Cal. 374, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, 33 Pac. 1122.

Errors committed, omissions of findings of fact, and other defects in the record of proceedings in a divorce suit, even important enough to require a reversal of the judgment upon a regular appeal from it, render it voidable only, not void, and do not require the setting aside of the decree after it has been granted, in an independent and direct proceeding brought for the purpose of vacating it. Faulkner v. Faulkner (1916) 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404.

A prior judgment cannot be successfully attacked by bill in equity to set it aside for errors, irregularities, or even wrongdoing in the proceedings leading up to it, where the court was legally organized and had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and the complaining party had legal notice of the litigation and an opportunity to be heard. Day v. Hurchman (1913) 65 Fla. 186, 61 So. 445.

Irregularities, errors, failure to comply with statutory requirements, and the like, not going to the jurisdiction of the court, of which the defendant in a divorce suit might have taken advantage to prevent a decree, but to which, without collusion or fraud, he omitted to object, although he appeared generally, cannot be available to the heirs at law of the plaintiff's second husband, after his death, in a suit in equity to set aside the decree and annul the second marriage. Richardson v. King (1912) 157 Iowa, 287, 135 N. W. 640.

An irregularity or defect in a service by publication in a divorce suit which possibly gave the court no jurisdiction of the defendant is cured when the defendant comes in and moves to set aside the judgment upon the double ground that the affidavit for publication was insufficient and that the petition failed to state a cause of action, because the urging of the second ground necessarily implies a general appearance in the action, and per se confers jurisdiction of the person. Pratt v. Pratt (1914) 41 Okla. 577, 139 Pac. 261.

The transfer, hearing, and decision of a motion to vacate a decree of divorce, from one to another county, and before a different judge of a court of general jurisdiction, pursuant to written stipulation and waiver of technical objections made by counsel for both parties, for mutual convenience, does not affect the validity of the order denying the motion on the merits, duly entered in the proper county. Meisenheimer v. Meisenheimer (1909) 55 Wash. 32, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1005, 104 Pac. 159.

That a divorce suit was called for trial out of its regular order, in a different court room from that designated and devoted to the trial of causes, without notice to counsel for or the spouse against whom a decree was made, are facts sufficient to authorize the setting aside of the judgment, although they do not, strictly speaking, render it a nullity, being rather irregularities of procedure than jurisdictional defects. McConkey v. McConkey (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

The doctrine of the cases immediately above has been modified in some jurisdictions by statutes. In Nebraska (Civ. Code, § 602) and Iowa (Code, § 4091) district courts have been empowered to vacate or modify judgments and grant new trials of actions at later terms for errors in proceedings against infants or lunatics when the errors or the status of the defendants do not appear on the face of the record. These statutes apply to decrees and suits for divorce. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492; Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

The inadvertence of a court in rendering a judgment in a divorce suit without giving any consideration to the question of an allowance to the wife to cover her expenses and attorney's fees in the action constitutes a sufficient reason for the court to set aside the decree during the term at which it was rendered, upon due application, for the purpose of passing upon the question of such an allowance. Foote v. Foote (1913) 53 Ind. App. 673, 102 N. W. 393.

While an order setting aside a decree of divorce, made by the court which granted it, during the same term, is erroneous and unauthorized if no notice of the application to vacate it was given to the opposite party, nevertheless it will stand where such party elects to come in afterwards and be heard upon the merits. Ficener v. Ficener (1887) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 867, 3 S. W. 597.

A court which has granted an absolute judgment of divorce in proceedings in all respects regular and in due form, reserving nothing for future adjudication, and completely disposing of the entire subject, is without the power to vacate the decree and restore the case to the docket of its own motion and within a week of granting it, solely upon the ground that the man who got it had, in the meantime, married another woman. Bentz v. Bentz (1900) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1225, 54 S. W. 715.

A decree of divorce altered without authority, either by a court or a stranger, after its terms had been settled and passed, may be challenged like any other altered instrument as not binding upon the parties in interest. Kwentsky v. Sirovy (1909) 142 Iowa, 385, 121 N. W. 27.

After a decree of divorce rendered at the end of a trial has been prepared, signed by the presiding judge, and spread upon the records of the court as the judgment in the case, and several days have elapsed, a material alteration in its terms, made by the judge who signed it, upon an ex parte application of the attorneys who obtained it, without any notice to or hearing of the adverse litigant, is without authority of law, notwithstanding the term had not expired; and the changed decree, so far as it is altered, is a nullity. Ibid.

A judgment of divorce granted a plaintiff on the coming in of a referee's report in favor of a defendant after a trial of issues where a defense was interposed must be set aside as having been rendered inadvertently; since it is only in cases where no defense has been interposed, and the referee, taking proofs, has reported adversely, that the court has power to refuse confirmation and grant the decree if the facts proved so warrant, notwithstanding the conclusion of the referee. Merrill v. Merrill (1871) 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 74.

XXIX. Defects in post-judgment procedure in divorce suits.

Although the Constitution and laws of a state make it the duty of a party in whose favor a decree of divorce has been rendered to deliver to the legislature a transcript of it and the proceedings in the suit, to the end that it may be confirmed by statute, such a decree is not invalid because the law confirmatory of it was not enacted at the next session of the legislature after it was rendered, where neither the Constitution nor the acts passed pursuant thereto have prescribed the time within which the legislature must act to give validity to such decree. Harrison v. Harrison (1851) 19 Ala. 499.

The defendant in a divorce suit in which a decree was granted but never formally signed and entered cannot successfully resist the entry of or vacate a decree entered nunc pro tunc, where both he and his former wife each remarried upon the faith of the divorce and in reliance on its validity. Sease v. Johnson (1906) 130 Ill. App. 35.

A decree of divorce irregularly filed of record, in violation of a rule of court forbidding it to be entered until the costs have been paid, is not open to attack in another suit in another court and jurisdiction, between one of the parties and a new spouse, for a dissolution of the later marriage, predicated upon the theory that the earlier one had not been legally dissolved. Baker v. Baker (1904) 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 553.

The probative force and effect of a sealed and duly certified copy of a judgment of divorce, made by the clerk of the court which granted it, to the effect that it was a true copy of a decree regularly entered, and made within a short time of the date of entry, is not impaired by a certificate from his successor in office, many years afterwards, to the effect that he had been unable to find in the court's records any record of such decree, and that by neglect or error the then clerk failed to transcribe it, as required by law, because the failure of the clerk to discharge his clerical duties with respect of recording the original decree, which was in fact granted, did not and could not nullify it. Douglas v. Teller (1909) 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761.

XXX. Opening decrees of divorce taken by default.*a. Discretion of court to grant relief.

An application grounded upon allegations of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, to open a decree of divorce entered on default, and for leave to come in and defend the action, is addressed to the sound discretion of the court. Morton v. Morton (1897) 117 Cal. 443, 49 Pac. 557; Bowman v. Bowman (1872) 64 Ill. 75.

The exercise of the discretion of the court upon an application for relief from a default and a decree of divorce entered thereon on a bill taken pro confesso is reviewable on appeal. Bowman v. Bowman (Ill.) supra.

But unless that discretion plainly has been abused, the decision of the court granting or denying the application will not be disturbed on appeal. Morton v. Morton (Cal.) supra; Darwin v. Darwin (1915) 27 Idaho, 303, 149 Pac. 467; Jones v. Jones (1908) 37 Mont. 155, 94 Pac. 1056; Howell v. Howell (1911) 89 Neb. 243, 131 N. W. 216; McCord v. McCord (1901) 24 Wash. 529, 64 Pac. 748.

The denial of a wife's application to vacate a decree of divorce obtained by her husband against her by default, brought about by his promise, relied upon by her, to pay her a sum of money, which he afterwards repudiated and did not pay, is discretionary, and not the subject of review in the appellate courts. Melvin v. Melvin (1904) 73 N. H. 602, 58 Atl. 835.

No abuse of discretion in denying a motion to open a decree of divorce entered on default because of alleged mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, such as must appear to warrant the interference of an appellate court, exists where the supporting and opposing testimony as to facts conflicted. Morton v. Morton (Cal.) supra.

The discretion of the court in granting a motion to open a default and set aside a decree of divorce made a few days before, while the defendant and her witnesses were all in attendance in court and ready for trial, and her counsel departed upon the assumption that the case on trial ahead would take up the entire day, because of the assurance of the counsel engaged in that trial and a misunderstanding of statements of the trial judge, cannot be said to have been abused. Jones v. Jones (1908) 37 Mont. 155, 94 Pac. 1056.

The discretion of the court which had granted a decree of divorce was not abused by setting it aside at the same term to hear further evidence. Howell v. Howell (1911) 89 Neb. 243, 13 N. W. 216.

Neither is it an abuse of discretion to deny an application to open a case and be heard on the merits where a decree of divorce had been granted by default after a personal service of process, and the testimony on such application was conflicting. Darwin v. Darwin (1915) 27 Idaho, 303, 149 Pac. 467.

In that case, however, Budge, J., of the court, while admitting the rule upon which the conclusion rested to be sound in actions other than for divorce, dissented from the conclusion, because he insisted that the public interest required more liberality in opening defaults in divorce suits.

Notwithstanding the public interest, one court has gone farther, and held that a decision denying an application to set aside, in order to come in and defend, a divorce granted by default upon a constructive service, no fraud being charged or lack of jurisdiction appearing, did not constitute an abuse of discretion requiring a reversal on appeal. McCord v. McCord (1901) 24 Wash. 529, 64 Pac. 748.

It is an abuse of discretion in the legal sense for a court which granted a decree of divorce by default, where there had been no personal service, to deny the defendant's motion to open the case, answer the bill, and have his day in court, made at the same term and upon a showing sufficient to create doubts of the propriety of the decree. Nihell v. Nihell (1911) 161 Ill. App. 589.

It is an abuse of discretion in a court at special term, upon granting a motion by a wife to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband by default after a disputed personal service of the summons, to impose as a condition the payment of heavy costs, when she was wholly unable to pay, and dependent upon her husband for support, because terms so onerous are not "such as justice requires," within the meaning of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 724), allowing defaults to be opened. Fox v. Fox (1911) 143 App. Div. 483, 127 N. Y. Supp. 989 (Burr, J., dissenting), rehearing denied in (1911) 144 App. Div. 906, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1123.

The right to have a judgment obtained by fraud annulled is not an absolute one, and the court may, in any given case, upon such equitable considerations as the circumstances demand, set it aside conditionally. Geisberg v. O'Laughlin (1903) 88 Minn. 431, 93 N. W. 310; Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

A husband has no absolute right upon a petition presented as soon as a divorce a mensa et thoro has been granted to his L.R.A.1917B.

wife against him, on account of his cruelty to her, which caused her to flee from him, to an annulment or suspension of the decree upon his unconditional offer to receive back and well-treat his wife afterwards, but the court, in its discretion, may deny his petition, or, in a proper case, grant it. Breinig v. Breinig (1856) 26 Pa. 161.

A motion by a wife to open a judgment of divorce rendered against her by default after personal service of the summons upon her, made a year after the decree was granted, is addressed to the discretion of the court, and the decision upon it, reached upon conflicting affidavits, is not reviewable on appeal. Lessig v. Lessig (1908) 136 Wis. 403, 117 N. W. 792.

b. Liberality the rule.

In some of the states the courts strongly incline toward liberality in setting aside decrees of divorce granted by default. It has been said that the courts are and ought to be, because of the public interest in matrimonial controversies, more liberal in affording relief from decrees of divorce granted by default than from judgments and decrees in other cases unaffected by public policy. McBlain v. McBlain (1888) 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61; Wadsworth v. Wadsworth (1889) 81 Cal. 182, 15 Am. St. Rep. 38, 22 Pac. 640.

The courts should be as liberal in opening defaults in suits to annul marriages, and for the same reasons, as they are in divorce suits. Wadsworth v. Wadsworth (Cal.) supra.

The reasons for setting aside or annulling decrees entered by mistake, surprise, or in circumstances such as satisfy courts that they should be vacated, are asserted to be more forceful in divorce suits than in other litigations because of the public interest and policy. Foxwell v. Foxwell (1913) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494.

Ordinarily an application to set aside a decree of divorce entered upon a default, if not unduly delayed, and founded upon an alleged good defense, where the rights of no third persons are involved, will be granted upon terms. Weidner v. Weidner (1895) 85 Hun, 432, 32 N. Y. Supp. 894.

The rule that a default will not be opened to permit the interposition of a defense not meritorious is not rigidly applied in actions for absolute divorces because of their effect upon the status of the litigants and their offspring. Hamilton v. Hamilton (1898) 29 App. Div. 331, 51 N. Y. Supp. 365.

The rules governing the opening of judgments taken by default in ordinary actions respecting mere pecuniary liability are not to be applied in divorce cases with the same rigor. Henderson v. Henderson (1903) 83 App. Div. 449, 82 N. Y. Supp. 444.

The strict rules respecting the opening of default judgments ought not to be applied in divorce suits because of the well-known vigilance of the courts to prevent collusion, and because of the public interest to preserve the matrimonial status. Fox v. Fox (1911) 143 App. Div. 483, 127 N. Y. Supp. 989, rehearing denied in (1911) 144 App. Div. 906, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1123.

A divorce granted for default of an answer, to a husband from his wife, on the ground of her adultery, should be set aside to allow her to defend upon her motion, promptly made, where no injustice can result, and it is set up that the wife's failure to answer was due to a mistake of her attorney respecting her wishes, and his opinion that her defense of a foreign divorce in her favor, and her marriage on the faith of it to her alleged paramour, was not valid, even where it turns out that her divorce was void because the court which granted it had no jurisdiction over her husband. Hamilton v. Hamilton (N. Y.) supra.

The law, it has been said, encourages defenses in divorce suits, and, in a case where the marriage took place abroad, and the charges relate to conduct in another state, and the wife is defendant and lives in a distant state, and was not found or served within the jurisdiction, and where she appears at the earliest possible time before the court has adjourned after making an ex parte decree by default, not only to defend on the merits, but offering to show that the husband had practised a fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court by claiming a local residence not his, she ought to be encouraged and helped by the exercise of every legitimate judicial power. Bostwick v. Bostwick (1889) 73 Tex. 182, 11 S. W. 178.

As a general rule, a litigant prosecuting or defending an action in good faith against whom a judgment has been taken by default because of the failure of a pleading or other paper to arrive in time to prevent it, where it was duly mailed, properly addressed and prepaid, in good season, or shipped by express, or transmitted from baggage-master to baggagemaster of a regular railroad (methods of transmission in general use and usually safe and reliable), and was delayed on the way, is entitled to have the judgment set aside. Malone v. Big Flat Gravel Min. Co. (1892) 93 Cal. 384, 28 Pac. 1063; Clark v. Oyharzabal (1900) 129 Cal. 328, 61 Pac. 1119; Loeb v. Schmith (1868) 1 Mont. 87; Boyd v. Williams (1903) 70 N. J. L. 185, 56 Atl. 135; Corning v. Tripp (1844) 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 14; Williams v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 110 N. C. 466, 15 S. E. 97; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Reese (1910) 26 Okla. 613, 110 Pac. 1071; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Eastham (1910) 26 Okla. 605, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 110 Pac. 887.

This rule has been recognized and applied in a divorce case.

The failure of a postmaster at the place where an answer in a divorce action, duly sealed and addressed to the clerk of the court, with the proper postage prepaid, was mailed in time to be delivered, pursuant to an order of court requiring it to be filed upon a day fixed, to send out the mail from his office as promised, is such an accident as entitles the defendant, who had been reasonably diligent on his own part, to an order, at once applied for, setting aside a decree of divorce entered by default. Walrad v. Walrad (1894) 55 Ill. App. 668.

A judgment of divorce granted ex parte for default of an answer in a cause taken up out of regular order upon the docket at a trial term, where the defendant was not a resident of the state, and had been served outside of it, should be set aside, upon an application of defendant, made the same day, tendering a meritorious defense and praying a continuance upon sufficient grounds. Bostwick v. Bostwick (1889) 73 Tex. 182, 11 S. W. 178.

A bill in equity to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud, alleging that the trial was, by agreement of the parties, adjourned for the term, and that the successful party, after the departure of the complainant and his attorney from the court room, misrepresented fraudulently to the court the facts, procured an order canceling the continuance, and obtained judgment by a default, is good upon demurrer. Evans v. Wilhite (1910) 167 Ala. 587, 52 So. 845.

That a divorce suit at issue regularly, and ready for trial, was transferred to another forum without notice to the defendant, and there tried ex parte, affords ground for setting aside the decree and ordering a new trial on motion promptly made for the purpose Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Oal. 457, 23 Pac. 531.

A decree of divorce granted to a man from his wife on the ground of her adultery, by default at trial term for failure on her part to appear for trial after joining issue and setting up a good defense on the merits, where she had moved and been refused a postponement after presenting proof of the absence in Europe of a material witness in her behalf, and her own inability to be present because of a serious personal illness, should be opened upon her motion seasonably made thereafter, upon such terms as are just, notwithstanding the plaintiff had, in the meantime, married another woman. Scripture v. Scripture (1893) 70 Hun, 432, 24 N. Y. Supp. 301.

A decree of divorce granted at trial term on account of the defendant's failure to appear at trial, after an application to postpone, upon a physician's certificate of illness, rejected for lack of verification on oath, should be set aside on motion promptly made, accompanied by indisputable evidence that the defendant was in fact actually too ill to attend the trial. Henderson v. Henderson (1903) 83 App. Div. 449, 82 N. Y. Supp. 444.

The case of Jewell v. Jewell (1904) 96 App. Div. 633, 89 N. Y. Supp. 166, bore a marked similarity to Henderson v. Henderson (N. Y.) supra, and the default taken at the trial was set aside on proof that the wife was in a sanatorium, actually confined to her bed, with her leg in a plaster cast on account of chronic inflammation of the knee.

A judgment of divorce taken by default at trial term against a wife unable to appear for trial on account of illness, and after the denial of an application by her counsel for a postponement, will be set aside on her motion, promptly made, where there had been three previous trials of the case and disagreements of the jury each time, showing the merit of the defense. Mott v. Mott (1909) 134 App. Div. 569, 119 N. Y. Supp. 483.

A public announcement by a trial court toward the end of a trial term that all civil cases would be continued and all the parties to them might go to their homes, while sufficient to justify a court of equity in setting aside a judgment afterwards taken against an absent defendant who had a good defense and was not in default, is not sufficient to relieve a defendant who was already in L.R.A.1917B.

default when the announcement was made, because the continuance neither excused the default nor deprived the plaintiff of his right to judgment. National Fertilizer Co. v. Hinson (1893) 103 Ala. 532, 15 So. 844.

The refusal of a trial court to continue the trial of a divorce suit beyond the term upon an application made after the cause had been reached for trial, toward the end of the term, because of a neglect to employ local counsel in time and a consequent unpreparedness for trial, affords no ground for setting aside a decree of divorce after the party to whom the divorce was granted has remarried. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576.

The order of a trial judge refusing to open a default and set aside a decree granted in a divorce suit upon a motion by the defeated spouse, grounded upon an alleged but disputed oral consent to put the case over the term, will not be disturbed on appeal where the record shows that the beaten litigant was present in person and testified in his own behalf when the decree was granted, without applying for a postponement or objecting to going on in the absence of his counsel, or asking leave to engage other counsel, and where the testimony established good grounds for the decree. Erickson v. Erickson (1914) — Iowa, —, 147 N. W. 737.

In Iowa for many years appeals to the supreme court were held to lie from judgments entered by default, and more recently the practice in such cases has been regulated by statute. By one enactment (Code, § 3790) default judgments void for jurisdictional defects may be set aside on such terms as seem to the courts to be just. If a default judgment of divorce is absolutely void for want of jurisdiction, the defendant, it is said, may attack it, either directly or collaterally, at any time. By another statute (Code, § 4105) a judgment or order cannot be reversed for an error which could have been corrected in the lower court until a motion therein to correct it has been made and overruled. By another section (Code, § 4106) the supreme court was empowered on appeal to review and reverse any judgment or order of the superior or district court, although no motion for a new trial had been made therein. The apparent conflict between these sections has been reconciled by construing the latter one to apply only to cases of judgments entered after a trial of the issues, and not to default judgments. The other section has been held to cover decrees of divorce entered by default after service by publication, and hence to preclude a review by appeal in the supreme court of a decree attacked for irregular service without any preliminary motion in the lower court to set aside the service. Belknap v. Belknap (1912) 154 Iowa, 213, 134 N. W. 734.

Unless a statute requires terms to be imposed by way of payment of costs or otherwise as a condition of opening a judgment taken by default in a divorce suit, the court need not impose terms upon granting the motion. Cottrell v. Cottrell (1890) 83 Cal. 457, 23 Pac. 531. If the terms imposed as a condition of opening a decree of divorce entered upon default are unjust or unreasonable, in the light of all the circumstances, they will be mitigated on appeal. Weidner v. Weidner (1895) 85 Hun, 432, 32 N. Y. Supp. 894.

The failure of one who obtained leave to defend an action for divorce after judgment had been granted against him by default, to meet the terms prescribed as a condition for the relief given, leaves the decree in full force. Howatt v. Howatt (1913) 158 App. Div. 28, 142 N. Y. Supp. 908.

XXXI. Application and effect of legislation concerning suits for divorce in attacking decrees.

The jurisdiction of courts in divorce suits has been said to rest wholly upon statute; and if the legislature has not conferred it in any given case, it does not exist. Baugh v. Baugh (1877) 37 Mich. 59, 26 Am. Rep. 495.

It has also been said that it is a general principle of the law of divorce in this country that the courts of either law or equity possess no powers except such as are conferred by statute; and, therefore, authority for the action of a court in that class of cases must be found in the statute and cannot be looked for elsewhere. Hopkins v. Hopkins (1875) 39 Wis. 167.

The idea thus expressed has had a great influence upon courts when construing and interpreting statutes providing for setting aside or opening judgments, in respect of their application to decrees of divorce.

A petition for a review of a final judgment which dismissed a libel for a divorce in order that the libellant might have a new trial was held, in Lucas v. Lucas (1854) 3 Gray (Mass.) 136, be- L.R.A.1917B.

yond the judicial power to entertain, because it was said the power to review depended upon statute, and the Massachusetts statute conferring authority to grant reviews in all civil actions—the only statute in point—did not embrace libels for divorces, which, while in a sense civil actions, were different in essentials from all other legal controversies.

A general statute regulating practice in chancery, and allowing, under stated conditions, nonresident defendants not personally served the right to appear and defend, was, in Owens v. Sims (1866) 3 Coldw. (Tenn.) 544, held not to apply to divorce suits, and for this reason, and also because no other statute authorized a divorce suit to be revived after one spouse had died, a wife's application to open a decree of divorce obtained against her by her husband in his lifetime upon substituted service by publication which in fact gave her no notice was denied.

An Iowa statute (Rev. 1860, § 3160) not quoted in the report, but referred to as one providing that a defendant served only by publication, and not appearing, against whom a judgment had been rendered, within the next two years might come into court and move to have the action retried, was held, in Gilruth v. Gilruth (1866) 30 Iowa, 226, to have no application to divorce suits; but the court added: "It does not follow, however, that the defendant is without remedy of some kind if in fact she has suffered injury from the wrongful acts of the plaintiff. But it is not our province to advise or even suggest what the same may be."

This statute in its later form (Code, § 3796) was again held not to apply to divorce suits, in the case of Tollefson v. Tollefson (1908) 137 Iowa, 151, 114 N. W. 631.

In Indiana, in the middle of the nineteenth century, a statute in force allowed chancery decrees entered after service of process by publication only to be opened in order to permit the defense of the suit any time during five years. A contemporary statute provided that the practice and proceedings in divorce suits should be the same, with certain specified exceptions, as in other cases in chancery.

These statutes were held in McJunkin v. McJunkin (1851) 3 Ind. 30, not applicable in divorce suits. In that case a wife divorced in October, 1845, by a default decree entered in a suit commenced by publication only, applied at the next term of the court, in February, 1846, for leave to come in and defend and to open the decrees on the ground that she had never had notice of the bringing of the action, nor any knowledge whatever that a suit was pending. Her application was denied upon an affidavit of the husband that he had married again since the decree, and that the allegations of the wife's proposed answer were not true. No question of fraud was raised in that case.

The question of setting aside for fraud a decree of divorce was adverted to, but left undecided, in the next case, Wooley v. Wooley (1859) 12 Ind. 663. In that case, the application was made to set aside the decree under a statute authorizing the court in certain cases to grant relief within one year against judgments suffered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable negligence. The application was seasonably made, but granted in part after the year expired, and the order was reversed for that reason.

In McQuigg v. McQuigg (1859) 13 Ind. 294, an application was made to set aside a decree of divorce for fraud in obtaining it through a false averment by the plaintiff of a bona fide residence in the state when he was only a temporary sojourner for the sole purpose of procuring a divorce. Three years had elapsed and a remarriage had taken place since the decree was entered. The application was denied for want of power, the court holding that the equitable power to set aside judgments of superior courts by bill in chancery for fraud, or by complaint in the nature of such a bill, had been entirely superseded by the Indiana statutes relating to the vacating of judgments, and that relief could be had only under such statutes and by methods thereby given, and these did not cover cases of fraud.

In Hoffman v. Hoffman (1860) 15 Ind. 278, the facts and questions of law being similar, the decision of the court followed McQuigg v. McQuigg (Ind.) supra, without discussion or comment.

Tacit approval of these doctrines was given by the court in Rindge v. Rindge (1864) 22 Ind. 35, in refusing an application of a man to open a decree of divorce granted him against his wife in order to get more favorable terms respecting alimony and property given to her by the judgment.

In Gage v. Clark (1864) 22 Ind. 163, the court reiterated, upon the authority of McQuigg v. McQuigg (Ind.) supra, that "the modes of vacating judgments in the higher courts are pointed out by statute and must be severally followed."

The decision in Ewing v. Ewing (1865) 24 Ind. 468, followed upon the same doctrine. In that case the court held that there were but two sections of the Indiana Code which authorized a new trial or relief against a judgment after the term at which the judgment was rendered; one, allowing the court, in its discretion, to grant relief any time within one year from a judgment rendered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, and the other where causes for a new trial are discovered after judgment, and application for relief is made not later than the second term after the discovery; and neither of these applied to decrees of divorce.

Then came the case of Willman v. Willman (1877) 57 Ind. 500, with a departure from the then hitherto-accepted doctrines. In that case, while the court said it was a well-settled rule of law that there can be no proceedings to review a judgment of divorce, yet that rule had a practical application only to cases in which the decree was valid, and did not prevent the annulment of a decree void for want of jurisdiction of either the subject matter or the parties.

The doctrine that the statutes provided the only means of setting aside judgments in Indiana received a rude shock in Nealis v. Dicks (1880) 72 Ind. 374, where it was held that the power and right of courts of equity to set aside judgments procured by fraud were unquestionable, and that they were possessed fully by the courts of Indiana, and not restricted by the statutes.

This case was followed by that of Cavanaugh v. Smith (1882) 84 Ind. 380, in which it was declared to be well settled that a judgment may be attacked for fraud, and that such an attack may be made in some of the methods established by the rules of equity. The latter case was one in which a decree of divorce was attacked on the ground that it was procured by means of a false return of service of process on a nonresident defendant.

Then came the case of Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27, in which the court, while refusing to set aside a decree of divorce procured by a gross fraud on the court and the complainant because of the latter's inexcusable laches in delaying for fifteen years to bring a bill in equity to annul it, where a remarriage of the defendant had occurred in the meantime, nevertheless concluded that such a bill was maintainable notwithstanding standing and despite the statutes on the subject of opening judgments and forbidding reviews of decrees of divorce. In that case the court re-examined the whole question and reviewed the previous decisions in point expressly to overrule such as conflicted with the stated conclusion.

The substance of the opinion in this case, which is an epochal one, may worthily be given. According to its author the complaint presented a case of a deliberate determination to defraud and injure the complainant, and to prostitute the courts of the state to accomplish that end. The court in one county, which had jurisdiction of the parties, being used as a decoy to fix her attention while the court in another county was misled and deceived by a false return of service of process and false statements as to residence, if by no other fraud, into rendering the decree of divorce. The case made by the complaint, it was said, was one calling loudly for relief if it could be granted consistent with well-settled rules of law. It was admitted that in Indiana the policy had been not to review or disturb decrees of divorce,—a rule adopted by the legislature and the courts from considerations of public policy. But, it was said, this did not sanction upholding decrees rendered in fraud of the courts; that every consideration demanded that fraud upon litigants should be rebuked; that courts should purge their records of all judgments and decrees procured by deception, fraud, or perjury; that the considerations of public policy forbidding the review of decrees of divorce applied only when the decrees were in fact rendered by courts having jurisdiction of the subject and parties. The opinion continued: The courts of this state cannot review judgments of divorce; this is prohibited by statute. In some of the earlier cases it seems to have been held that, in order to obtain relief from a judgment, the statute must be followed, and that the mode therein pointed out is exclusive of all others, and that, as it is provided that judgments of divorce cannot be reviewed, there is no remedy.

There were then cited and commented upon the cases lending support to this doctrine, some of them being distinguished from the instant case, and it was added: "It may be said that the uniform ruling of this court has been that a judgment of divorce cannot be reviewed under the section of the Code authorizing such a proceeding in ordinary actions, and that new trials after the term at which decrees may have been rendered cannot be had in divorce cases under the section of the Code authorizing such new trials in ordinary civil actions." Also, that "from the cases above examined, the former rulings seem to have been that no relief could be had from judgments in any case except in the manner pointed out in the Code, and that, as no mode is provided by statute in divorce cases, no relief from such judgments could be had."

While this was so, the later, and what were thought to be the better-considered cases of Willman v. Willman (1877) 57 Ind. 500, and Nealis v. Dicks (1880) 72 Ind. 374, departed from the path the others had followed, the first in holding the rule that divorce cases cannot be reviewed to be limited to valid judgments, and in drawing a distinction between a proceeding to review and one to vacate and set aside a judgment, and the second in holding that the statute concerning reviewing judgments was not restrictive of judicial power to set them aside to the causes and modes specified, and the exclusion of others, but that the courts have the power and right to annul them for fraud in obtaining them. And the more recent case of Cavanaugh v. Smith (1882) 84 Ind. 380, was pronounced well considered and equally strong on the same side. "These late cases," said the court, continuing, "supported as they are by reason and a very full citation of authorities, establish the doctrine in this state that judgments obtained by fraud upon the court may be successfully assaulted for that reason, and that in such assault the grounds and mode pointed out in the statute are not exclusive." And inasmuch as the authorities without the state make no distinction between divorce and other judgments, and no reason exists why there should be any such distinction, the court concluded that there was no reason for a distinction in Indiana, and therefore, "where by deceit and fraud a court is deceived into assuming jurisdiction and entering decrees dissolving the marital tie . . . every consideration of public policy and regard for innocent children require that the court, upon the discovery of such fraud, shall protect itself and the public therefrom, . . . that when such a wrong has been consummated in the obtaining of decrees of divorce the courts have the right and owe the duty to set them aside and declare them null and void."

The court, having reached this conclusion, did not hesitate to take the logical step and declare that, so far as the case of McQuigg v. McQuigg (1859) 13 Ind. 294, and those that had followed it, conflicted with this conclusion, they should be overruled.

The overruling of the McQuigg Case was confirmed in Powell v. Powell (1885) 104 Ind. 23, 3 N. E. 639.

The Indiana statute (Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901, § 1042) which provides that a party against whom a divorce shall have been granted without other notice than a publication in a newspaper may, within two years, have the decree opened and be allowed to defend, is held to have no application to a case where the party who obtained the divorce died in the meantime, and neither alimony nor property rights were affected by the decree. Day v. Nottingham (1903) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

In Kansas the course of judicial opinion was markedly similar. In that state it was held at first that a decree of divorce entered by default after a service only constructive by publication, against a defendant actually residing out of the country, where such service had been legally made without any trick, falsehood, or imposition of any sort, and where every step pointed out by statute had been fairly and correctly taken, pursuant to the act authorizing service of notice in divorce cases to be made upon a nonresident defendant by publication in a newspaper for a stated length of time, and through the postoffice by mailing a copy of the petition and of the published notice, properly addressed, to the defendant, and inclosed in a sealed and prepaid envelop,—was in all respects a legal and valid judgment which could not be set aside by motion under a statute authorizing judgments in suits "without other service than by publication in a newspaper" to be vacated, because the provision for mailing and a compliance with its requirements took divorce cases out of the application of the statute, notwithstanding proof that the published notice never came under the eye of the defendant and the mail matter never reached the addressee until after the decree had been entered. Lewis v. Lewis (1875) 15 Kan. 181.

This case was at first distinguished and limited by a decision that a decree of divorce entered by default after a service solely by publication in a newspaper, without any mailing whatever, because the plaintiff had filed an affidavit to the effect that no other service could be made, should, in virtue of the statute, be set aside, with leave to come in and L.R.A.1917B.

defend, on motion of the defendant, made within the prescribed time, showing a meritorious defense, and accompanied by proof of actual ignorance of the proceedings. Hemphill v. Hemphill (1888) 38 Kan. 220, 16 Pac. 457.

The decision in Lewis v. Lewis (Kan.) supra, was mildly criticized as "supported by some rather artificial reasoning" in Blair v. Blair (1915) 96 Kan. 757, 153 Pac. 544, where a divorced wife who sought, after thirty years, to set aside a decree based upon a substituted service, was denied relief because there was no property to be reached in the state of Kansas, and the husband had married another woman and died, leaving property in Missouri, where the second wife and her children by him lived, and could not be served with process personally in Kansas, and where a statute of Kansas gave only two years in which to obtain such relief on petition. Anent this, in the later case, contra to the doctrine of the earlier one, the court said: "If Blair were alive, and had not remarried and the conditions of the statutory remedy were complied with, no reason is apparent why it should not be available to the plaintiff. If he were alive, and, within the time allowed for vacating the judgment, he had remarried, there is still no reason why the remedy should not be available. The statute does not make an exception of divorce decrees or of divorce decrees in case a second marriage occur, and the statute itself is notice of power retained over the decree for a limited time. If the views already expressed be sound, that property rights flowing from the marital status may be recognized and protected although the status itself has been withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the court, Blair's death ought not to prevent the plaintiff from invoking the statutory remedy."

The doctrine of the Lewis Case was repudiated in the opinion of the court in Bell v. Bell (1916) 97 Kan. 616, 156 Pac. 778, where the way was open to distinguish it, had the court been minded to do so. The decision in the Bell Case was that the then general statute of Kansas respecting setting aside judgments entered on default after constructive service by publication, upon an application made within two years for leave to come in and defend, applied to decrees of divorce obtained by means of a false affidavit to procure authority to serve by publication, notwithstanding a new marriage had taken place on the faith of the decree. The court, in its opinion, referred to the case before it as one wherein the real question for determination was whether or not a decree of divorce was governed by a different rule, on account of public policy and the consequences involved, from that governing other judgments entered after constructive service by publication and on default obtained by means of fraud, and which by general statute might be set aside upon petition presented within two years. In the case at bar the spouse who had fraudulently obtained the divorce under attack had married another and had begotten a child by the second marriage, so that all the deplorable consequences had ensued the contemplation of which had so appalled the court in the Lewis Case as to lead it to deny, through "artificial reasoning," relief to the wronged wife.

The case of Blair v. Blair (1915) 96 Kan. 757, 153 Pac. 544, was cited in the Bell Case and therein said to have set at rest the question by deciding that the statute concerning the opening of judgments made no exception of divorces, or of decrees of divorce where second marriages had occurred, and was in itself notice that the power to vacate judgments of divorce as well as other judgments was retained for the time limited in the statute.

The supreme court of Nebraska, on the authority of McJunkin v. McJunkin (1851) 3 Ind. 30, and Lewis v. Lewis (1875) 15 Kan. 181, held a general statute of that state (Code, § 82, Gen. Stat. 536) which provided for opening judgments taken on constructive service inapplicable to divorces, and affirmed on writ of error a denial of a divorced wife's motion, seasonably made, to set aside the decree granted her husband by default on such a service, and for leave to answer and defend his suit on the merits. O'Connell v. O'Connell (1880) 10 Neb. 390, 6 N. W. 467.

An early statute of Missouri (Rev. Codes 1845, p. 426), which gave the circuit court, sitting as a court of chancery, jurisdiction in cases of divorce and alimony, and provided that the like process and proceedings should be had in those as in other equity causes; and an act regulating chancery practice (Rev. Codes 1845, art. 6, §§ 1-4, p. 851), which provided that a decree rendered against a defendant not summoned, who did not appear, might be set aside by bill of review filed within a stated time and verified by affidavit showing it to be against equity, were held applicable to decrees in divorce suits, and, conformably to such ruling, a decree granted to a husband was set aside on the divorced wife's bill strictly answering the statute, notwithstanding he had contracted a second marriage. Smith v. Smith (1854) 20 Mo. 166, Scott, J., dissenting.

It was afterwards decided, in sustaining a demurrer to the petition in the cause for failure to state a cause of action, in Childs v. Childs (1882) 11 Mo. App. 395, that, because of inhibitory legislation in Missouri, an original action would not lie in that state to set aside a divorce granted by default upon constructive service only by publication, and based on charges that the decree was obtained by fraud and falsehood.

In holding the demurrer good, Thayer, J., at nisi prius, took occasion to say; From the facts alleged by the plaintiff this would appear to be a case where a court of equity ought to interfere and set aside the original decree of divorce on the ground that the same was procured by fraud; but our statute respecting divorce has apparently barred the door to such relief. Section 2184 of the Revised Statutes of 1879 limits the right of appeal from a decree of divorce to the term at which the decree was rendered, and the right to sue out a writ of error to sixty days after the entry of the decree. Section 2185 (as if to close the way to all redress in matters of divorce where an appeal is not taken or a writ of error is not sued out in time) provides that "no petition for review of any judgment for divorce rendered in any case arising under this chapter shall be allowed, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." This proceeding is clearly a petition for review of the judgment or decree of divorce.

. . . The statute went into force in May, 1856, and has been incorporated into each subsequent revision. I am of the opinion, continued Judge Thayer, that the legislature intended by § 2185 of the divorce act to prohibit courts from entertaining petitions for review (based on any ground) after the lapse of the term at which the decree was rendered. They probably foresaw that persons once divorced might contract new relations by marriage with innocent third parties, and that to allow such decrees to be impeached, even for fraud, years or even months after they were rendered, would be productive of more harm than good. This ruling will not prevent the courts from setting aside decrees of divorce at any time, under the authority of Cole v. Cole (1877) 3 Mo. App. 571, where the record on its face shows that the court had no jurisdiction over the case and that the decree is a nullity; but where it is sought to impeach decrees of this character by evidence aliunde and for matter not apparent on the face of the record, the courts, in my opinion, have no power under the statute to proceed.

On appeal from Judge Thayer's decision sustaining the demurrer, Thompson, J., for the court of appeals, said: We concur in the foregoing opinion and adopt it as our opinion in this case.

. . . We will add, however, that, taking the facts stated in this petition to be true,—and the demurrer admits them to be true,—we regard this as a very hard case. It is the case of a woman whose husband, after having repeatedly repelled her from him, has finally abandoned her and left her and an infant daughter of their marriage for years in another state, without any support, until, in a state of extreme destitution, she places her cause in the hands of an attorney of this city, where her husband resides, only to find that he had been two years divorced from her in a proceeding of which she was wholly ignorant, of which he might easily have notified her, and that he is engaged in business and possessed of ample means of supporting her and their child. The learned counsel for this lady does not use strong language when he says that she stands here claiming a high and solemn equity at our hands. We regret that the legislature has prohibited us from listening to her petition. We would open the door of the circuit court to her if the lawmaking power had not barred it against her.

Five years later, the Missouri supreme court, in a case precisely like that, refused for the same reasons to grant relief from a decree of divorce which it characterized as having been procured by deception, fraud, and a systematic course of conduct on the part of the man who got it to keep his wife ignorant of his purpose and proceedings. As in the Childs Case, the decree had been granted by default ex parte, upon a service by publication only, but, unlike the Childs Case, the man had not married again and no rights of innocent third persons were involved. Salisbury v. Salisbury (1887) 92 Mo. 683, 4 S. W. 717.

There followed and were decided the same way Hansford v. Hansford (1889) 34 Mo. App. 262, and Smith v. Smith (1892) 48 Mo. App. 612, neither of which differed essentially from the Childs and Salisbury Cases.

Soon afterwards it was decided that when a statute provides that an interlocutory judgment entered by default may be set aside for good cause and upon such terms as shall be just, any time before a final judgment shall be rendered, and another statute regulates the proceedings to set aside final judgments, an application of a defendant served only by publication, made after the entry of a final judgment of divorce, to set aside the interlocutory decree, is too late, and must be denied. Burnes v. Burnes (1895) 61 Mo. App. 612.

Then came the case of Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94, on second appeal (1914) 257 Mo. 317, 165 S. W. 783, in which it was declared that the legislature had no power to deprive the courts of the right to set aside decrees of divorce for fraud in procuring them, under a state Constitution which, in express words, conferred upon them, as did Missouri's, general jurisdiction at law and in equity.

A statute, said the court in that case, which attempted to deprive one divorced by a judgment concocted in fraud and granted in a cause which the court was induced to take jurisdiction of by the plaintiff's perjury, without any notice to the defendant, of every possible remedy to upset it, would be unconstitutional and void for divesting the defendant of marital rights without due process of law.

The facts in that case were very like those in the Childs and Salisbury Cases. In each case there was an original petition addressed to the equity side of the court, praying that a decree of divorce be set aside, with leave to defend, on the ground that it had been procured by falsehood and fraud. In each case the question involved was whether or not the Missouri legislation barred the petitioner from the relief sought. In the first two cases that question was decided in the affirmative. On the first appeal in the third case, it was, with only one of the judges dissenting, decided in the negative.

It is worth while to give a brief consideration to the prevailing opinion, by Brown, C., adopted by the majority in banc as that of the court. After citing the prohibitory and restrictive legislation respecting reviews of judgments in divorce cases, the learned commissioner deftly cut away the foundation of the previous decisions by saying: That the petition in this case is not a petition for review under any reasonable definition of that term is evident. It neither corresponds to the definition of "bill of review" as formerly used in chancery practice, nor to the definition of "petition for review" as used in the practice act of which the practice relating to divorce and alimony forms a part. Proceeding, the opinion in the Salisbury Case was quoted from extensively and its inconsistency with an opinion by its author in a later case was pointed out and coupled with a statement that the court now could not reconcile the two, and must assume that the views of the judge who wrote both had, between time, undergone a change. The conclusion was: "We think that the gross frauds charged in the petition and admitted by the demurrer render the judgment of divorce which it seeks to set aside void as between the parties thereto, and that it should, upon the facts stated, be set aside in equity. We are also of the opinion that the statute invoked by defendant, forbidding the allowance of a petition for review in such cases, is not applicable to an original suit of this character, and was not intended to so apply. . . . If there is anything in the case of Salisbury v. Salisbury (1887) 92 Mo. 683, 4 S. W. 717, inconsistent with these views, it is, to that extent, disapproved."

The case having been remanded and tried on the merits, the fraud charged was established by the evidence, and the decree of divorce accordingly was set aside, and the defendant appealed. On this appeal the court, in affirming the judgment, said: We decline to recede from the rules of law announced in our majority opinion when this case was here upon the first appeal. If § 2381, Rev. Stat. 1909, forbidding a petition for the review of a judgment for divorce, is intended to prohibit relief in equity against such frauds as were perpetrated upon the circuit court and upon the plaintiff in obtaining the divorce granted to defendant, then clearly such section is unconstitutional. The power of courts to grant equitable relief against frauds is as firmly interwoven in our system of jurisprudence as the power to grant relief at law. The people having expressly conferred equitable powers upon the courts of this state by the very Constitution which calls courts into existence, the general assembly cannot withdraw or unreasonably restrict such powers without violating the organic law. . . . For the general assembly to undertake to nail up the doors of the courts of equity by saying to them that whatever may be done under the forms of the divorce statutes is too sacred to be inquired into is an unthinkable anomaly.

ertson, P. J., writing afterwards in McDonald v. McDonald (1913) 175 Mo. App. 513, 161 S. W. 850, does not prohibit an action to have a decree of divorce annulled by reason of alleged fraud in its procurement has been settled in the case of Dorrance v. Dorrance (1912) 242 Mo. 625, 148 S. W. 94.

It was held in Ohio in the case of Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482, that a bill in equity filed by a wife to set aside a decree of divorce procured by her husband, alleged to have been obtained by fraud and perjury, setting forth that the husband had, to confer jurisdiction on the court, falsely represented himself as a resident of the county, and suborned false witnesses to prove his residence; that the wife had never been served with notice of or had any knowledge of the bringing or pendency of the divorce suit; that the husband purposely procured the suppression of exchanges of newspapers publishing the notice with those of the wife's home, with intent to conceal from her the proceedings; that he took depositions secretly for the same object; and that he wickedly and corruptly suborned false witnesses to establish by perjury the charges he had made against her as a ground for divorce,—could not be maintained.

The court based its opinion upon the ground that the existing Ohio statute conferring jurisdiction in divorce cases on the courts of common pleas forbade an appeal from a decree of divorce and declared that it should be final and conclusive, and constituted a principle of public policy that judgments directly affecting the matrimonial status by dissolving the marriage bond so that new alliances could be contracted with innocent persons should never be reopened. And it relied upon the authority of Greene v. Greene (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454, in which the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts threw out a bill in equity to annul an absolute divorce alleged to have been procured by perjured testimony of the complainant's adultery.

The Parish Case was disapproved by the Maine supreme court in Adams v. Adams (1871) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134, which said that, as to its reasoning, "we cannot subscribe, and we think it is opposed both to principle and authority."

The Parish Case was also disapproved by the supreme court of Nebraska, which refused to agree with its reason in almost the same words that the Maine supreme court had used. Wisdom v. Wisdom

(1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

And the Parish Case was again cited, examined, and disapproved by the supreme court of North Dakota in rendering a contrary decision in the case of Yorke v. Yorke (1893) 3 N. D. 343, 55 N. W. 1095.

Constrained by the decision in Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482, Johnson, J., in Rine v. Hodgson (1883) 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 104, sustained a demurrer to a bill brought by a man against the next of kin of his deceased wife to set aside a divorce granted her from him after service by publication, alleging that she was, at the time, an imbecile, devoid of mental capacity, under care of her relatives, who his instituted and carried through the divorce proceedings in her name, she unwilling and not understanding their effect and purpose, which was solely to cut him off from his rights as husband in her estate.

But this decision was reversed on appeal (1884) 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 275, because the court distinguished Parish v. Parish (Ohio) supra, by limiting that decision to cases in which jurisdiction had been really acquired in the divorce suit over the defendant's person, and by holding that in the case at bar the court never had jurisdiction of the person of the nominal plaintiff because her mental condition made her incapable of conferring jurisdiction.

A general statute of Ohio (Rev. Stat. § 5335) in force at the time of the decision, and which applied to any judgment of the court of common pleas rendered upon a service by publication, and provided for opening it any time during five years, was by Abernathy, J., reluctantly held, in VanDerveer v. VanDerveer (1893) 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 828, to require the granting of a motion by the defendant so served, and made in time, to open a judgment of divorce and be let in to defend, since the court could find no statute making any exception even by implication in divorce cases, and, although personally opining it to be against public policy to open judgments of divorce, where another marriage had taken place, he felt powerless to deny a right given by statute.

Regarding the case of VanDerveer v. VanDerveer (Ohio) supra, it was held in Solomon v. Solomon (1904) 26 Ohio C. C. 307, that the general statute (Rev. Stat. § 5355), which was very similar in terms to, if not identical with, the statute in the earlier case, did not apply in divorce cases, because these were in a class by themselves, and involved matters of public policy, and were governed by different principles.

An opinion in accord with Solomon v. Solomon (Ohio) supra, was expressed in Casto v. Casto (1907) 10 Ohio C. C. N. S. 265, 30 Ohio C. C. 93, and Casto v. Casto (1907) 10 Ohio C. C. N. S. 268, 30 Ohio C. C. 96, where the application to set aside the divorce was grounded upon allegations of no notice of the proceedings, and there was a failure of the applicant to prove satisfactorily want of notice.

Then, after an elaborate review of the cases in point, the circuit court of Mercer county, in Mulligan v. Mulligan (1908) 11 Ohio C. C. N. S. 585, 31 Ohio C. C. 89, reversing the court below, held good on demurrer an amended petition brought to set aside for fraud and perjury in obtaining it a divorce granted upon substituted service. The court refused to follow Parish v. Parish (1859) 9 Ohio St. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 482, and held that the statute (Rev. Stat. § 5355) did apply to judgments of divorce as well as to other judgments rendered upon service by publication. It condemned the theory that public policy required divorces, however tainted by fraud, to be absolutely unassailable in order not to disturb second marriages contracted on the strength of them, and insisted that true public policy required the greater protection of the wronged wife than of the affinity or paramour who supplanted her.

Because of legislation originally enacted in 1816, forbidding a writ of error to issue to reverse any decree of divorce from the marriage contract, the court of appeals of Kentucky has held that it has no power to disturb a judgment which dissolves the bonds of matrimony, whether right or wrong, warranted or unwarranted by the facts, in so far as the divorce alone is concerned; but it may and does review the provisions respecting alimony and property rights in decrees of divorce. Maguire v. Maguire (1838) 7 Dana (Ky.) 181; Bourne v. Simpson (1849) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 454; Meyar v. Meyar (1860) 3 Met. (Ky.) 298; Bristow v. Bristow (1899) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 481, 51 S. W. 819; Green v. Green (1913) 152 Ky. 486, 153 S. W. 775.

The legislative restriction upon the court of appeals was not originally extended to the trial courts, for it was held that a court which had granted a decree of divorce might afterwards, upon a seasonable application and upon a proper showing, grant a new trial at a later term, in virtue of a general statute empowering courts to grant new trials after judgments by default upon constructive service. Meyar v. Meyar (1860) 3 Met. (Ky.) 298.

In that case, as one gathers the facts from the report, a wife applied to set aside a decree obtained by her husband, upon the ground that she had been led by him to believe that the suit had been abandoned, and did not learn otherwise until after judgment. She claimed that she had a good defense and had employed attorneys to answer, and that they had failed her. The court opened the decree, let the wife in to defend, and, on the final hearing, dismissed the suit, with leave to the husband to appeal to the court of appeals. On that appeal the court considered the appellant's objection to setting aside the decree well taken, and the order setting it aside erroneous because of the statute and the previous decisions respecting it, but, it added: "If, however, this is not so, we are still of the opinion that the appellant showed himself entitled to a divorce, and that a judgment divorcing him from the appellee should have been entered under the evidence finally introduced and presented to the court. It therefore follows that the order complained of was erroneous, and that the judgment dismissing the appellant's petition was also erroneous."

A court which has rendered a decree of divorce has not, in Kentucky, the power, at a subsequent term, upon an application by one party against the opposition of the other, to set the decree aside upon the ground that the attorney for the beaten party was in court every day of the term, and did not know that the cause was submitted, heard, or that judgment had been rendered, until the term had expired, when the only statute empowering the court to set aside divorces requires united application by both parties. Hendrix v. Hendrix (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 632, 76 S. W. 165. L.R.A.1917B.

The Kentucky statute (Civ. Code, § 344) which provides for the granting of new trials when grounds for them are discovered after the term at which the verdicts were found or decisions were rendered, when applications are made not later than the second terms after discoveries, and within three after final judgments, does not apply to decrees of divorce, so far as they dissolve the bonds of matrimony. Droste v. Droste (1910) 138 Ky. 53, 127 S. W. 506.

The only power a court has in Kentucky to annul a decree of divorce which it has granted, after the term at which it granted it, is by virtue of the statute (Civ. Code, § 426) providing for such action upon the verified petition of both parties. Ibid.

The Washington statute (Bal. Codes & Stat. § 4880) which provided that if the summons was not served personally on the defendant, he should, on application showing sufficient cause, be allowed to defend the action any time before judgment, and, except in divorce suits, any time within one year after judgment, on such terms as might be just, was construed by the supreme court to take away the power of the court which granted a decree of divorce upon substituted service by publication and for default of appearance and answer, to let a wife in to defend after judgment, if the jurisdiction of the court to grant the decree existed and no fraud had been practised on the court or defendant. Metler v. Metler (1903) 32 Wash. 494, 73 Pac. 535. The decision was grounded upon the familiar statement that the legislature intended to limit the right to defend divorce suits after judgment, because a decree affected the status of the parties both in respect of themselves and the public; and as the right to marry again ensued, grievous injury might result to innocent third persons if the decree could be disturbed.

An application to open a judgment of divorce granted by default upon service by publication, and grounded upon a charge that the plaintiff, well knowing the true postoffice address of the defendant, fraudulently named another, with intent to prevent the summons and complaint from coming to her knowledge by mail, and of purpose to deprive her of the opportunity to defend the suit, constitutes an exception to the statute construed in Metler v. Metler (Wash.) supra, and therein held to deny power to the court to vacate decrees of divorce granted where jurisdiction existed and fraud was not alleged. McDonald v.

McDonald (1904) 34 Wash. 293, 75 Pac. 865.

The Washington statute (Bal. Codes & Stat. § 4880) which was held in Metler v. Metler (Wash.) supra, to preclude the setting aside of divorces rendered on constructive service, was held not to deprive the court from opening a decree of divorce so rendered which had been procured by a fraudulent imposition on the court and the defendant which prevented knowledge of the suit and the making of any defense before judgment. Chaney v. Chaney (1909) 56 Wash. 145, 105 Pac. 229.

A general statute empowering a superior court after term time to vacate or modify a judgment or order for fraud practised by the party who obtained it, upon petition of the injured party, setting up the grounds and verified, embraces decrees of divorce irrespective of whether process was served personally or constructively, and regardless of a special statute permitting judgments entered in suits other than for divorce, upon substituted service, to be set aside within a year. Ibid.

In several states statutes authorizing judgments in general to be set aside in certain circumstances have been held to embrace decrees of divorce.

A general statute permitting any final decree in chancery, entered without other service of process than by publication, to be opened within a stated time to allow a defense to be made, applies to decrees of divorce. Lawrence v. Lawrence (1874) 73 Ill. 577.

In virtue of that statute a decree of divorce made upon a service only by publication does not become absolute until the expiration of the time named in the statute, and must be opened on a proper application and sufficient proof by the defeated spouse, notwithstanding the successful one remarried during the interval. Ibid. In this case three of the members of the court dissented; two of them taking the ground that the general statute respecting chancery decrees did not apply in divorce cases, and the third, while questioning its application, contending that, even if it did apply to decrees of divorce, inasmuch as it provided for opening decrees only upon terms such as should appear to be just, it would not be just to set aside a decree where a remarriage had taken place and the second wife was innocent, and would necessarily be thereby injured.

in invoking the jurisdiction of the court or in preventing a defense embraces decrees of divorce. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

The general statutes of Nebraska (Civ. Code, § 602) and Iowa (Code, § 4091), empowering district courts to vacate or modify their judgments or grant new trials at later terms for errors in proceedings against infants or lunatics where the errors or status do not appear by the record, have been held to apply to decrees and suits of divorce. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594; Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

A statute of Nevada (Rev. Laws, § 5084) gives a right to a defendant, available in divorce cases, to move to set aside and to have vacated a judgment rendered within the preceding half year upon a substituted service by publication and mailing which gave no actual notice, and it is immaterial whether or not any fraud was committed to obtain the decree. Miller v. Miller (1914) 37 Nev. 257, 142 Pac. 218.

A statute of Oklahoma authorizing original actions to set aside judgments, unlike, it is said, statutes in other jurisdictions where the contrary has been decided, has been held to be so worded as to have application to new actions to vacate or modify decrees of divorce upon sufficient grounds, instead of confining relief to proceedings in the suits for divorce. Holt v. Holt (1909) 23 Okla. 639, 102 Pac. 187.

A Texas statute (Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 1375) which provided that in cases where judgment was rendered on service by publication, and the defendant did not appear in person or by an attorney of her own selection, a new trial might be granted for good cause upon an application supported by the applicant's affidavit, was held to embrace decrees of divorce. Bracht v. Bracht (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 107 S. W. 895.

By a statute of Virginia (Code 1873, chap. 166, § 16), which applied as well to decrees of divorce as to other judgments, a defendant who was not served personally with process and who did not appear in the action became entitled to have the cause restored and reheard any time before the end of a five-year period, provided he was not served with a copy of the judgment more than a year before it ended. Cralle v. Cralle (1884) 79 Va. 182.

By a later statute of Virginia (Code, § 3233) an absentee spouse divorced without a personal service of process and without having appeared, and who petitioned for a rehearing within a year, was given a legal right to come in and answer to the end that any injustice that had been done by the decree might be corrected. Willard v. Willard (1900) 98 Va. 465, 36 S. E. 518.

A constitutional provision in Louisiana gave the supreme court jurisdiction of appeals from judgments of divorce, and, as a necessary consequence, of appeals from actions to annul judgments of divorce, these being only variant modes of revising or reversing judgments. Bryant v. Austin (1884) 36 La. Ann. 808.

The Nebraska Constitution (art. 1, § 24), in providing that the right to be heard in all civil cases in the court of last resort by appeal, error, or otherwise, should not be denied, and the statute (Code, § 675) giving either litigant the right to appeal from judgments, decrees, and final orders in equity actions, made by district courts, to the supreme court, were held to give or preserve the right to review decrees of divorce by the supreme court as in other cases. Brotherton v. Brotherton (1881) 12 Neb. 72, 10 N. W. 543.

A provisional decree of divorce granted in a suit begun by personal service under a statute then in force, allowing such a divorce for utter desertion, subject to be made absolute in case the parties continue for five years to live separately, where the desertion charged had occurred and continued for only a year before the suit was brought, is unauthorized by law and null when the statute had been repealed before the decree was granted, and replaced by a new statute which authorized a divorce absolute to be granted for utter desertion which had continued for three years previous to the beginning of proceedings, and consequently must be set aside upon the petition of the defeated spouse. Wales v. Wales (1875) 119 Mass. 89.

Under a Massachusetts statute (Act of 1870, chap 404) a decree of divorce might be had for causes which previously would have entitled the libellant to a decree of divorce from bed and board. It was in fact equivalent to such a decree, and did not dissolve the bond of matrimony until it was made absolute by the court by a new decree upon a new petition, after the couple had continued to live apart for a stated number of years. The decree nisi (so-called) was conclusive upon the parties in the absence of an impeaching fraud, and barred L.R.A.1917B.

a suit by the unsuccessful spouse for a divorce from the successful one upon any grounds set up in defense and adjudicated adversely. It left the marital obligation subsisting until it was made absolute, and for a breach of that obligation, occurring in the intervening time, the innocent spouse might maintain a suit against the guilty one for an absolute divorce. Edgerly v. Edgerly (1873) 112 Mass. 53.

XXXII. Effect on attacks on divorces of death of spouse granted decree.

The death of a spouse who procured a divorce by means of a palpable fraud will not defeat proceedings to vacate and annul the decree. Leathers v. Stewart (1911) 108 Me. 96, 79 Atl. 16, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 366.

The death, in and of itself alone, is no bar to an action to set aside the decree so obtained. Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341.

An action to annul a decree of divorce obtained by a clear and palpable fraud by default, on a service of process only constructive, if promptly brought after the facts have been discovered, may be successfully maintained by a wronged wife against the executor of the guilty husband, after his death. Bryant v. Austin (1884) 36 La. Ann. 808.

A decree of divorce entered in a suit of which apparent jurisdiction was conferred on the court by a fraud may be annulled notwithstanding the spouse who obtained it is dead. Rodgers v. Nichols (1905) 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923; Clay v. Robertson (1912) 30 Okla. 758, 120 Pac. 1102.

After the death of one or both parties to a divorce, if property rights are directly affected the decree may be attacked by appeal or otherwise, the same as any judgment. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

The right of a spouse aggrieved by a decree of divorce obtained by fraud, or fraudulently prevented from learning of the pendency of the divorce proceedings, or from appearing in them and defending, to have that decree set aside, may, and in some instances does, survive the death of the other spouse. Day v. Nottingham (1903) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

But an action for divorce, brought by a wife against her husband, involving naught save a dissolution of the marriage, in which neither alimony is asked nor any property interests are affected, ending in a decree in her favor, adjudg-ing that she pay the costs, is so wholly in rem that it dies with her person; and therefore an action to set aside the decree will not lie after she is dead. Ibid.

A court will not set aside for a fraud in procuring it a decree of divorce for sentimental reasons alone, where no property rights are involved, after the remarriage and death of the spouse to whom it was granted. Lawrence v. Nelson (1901) 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L.R.A. 583, 85 N. W. 84.

But if property rights have been invaded or taken away from the wronged spouse by such a decree, the death of the spouse who obtained it will be no bar to a suit in equity or other appropriate proceeding to set it aside. Ibid.

A divorced wife, after the husband's death, in a suit to partition lands of which he died seised, may, for the purpose of reaching and recovering her interest as widow in such lands, have set aside and annulled the judgment of divorce upon the ground that it was obtained by fraud and imposition on the husband's part. Daniels v. Benedict (1892) 50 Fed. 347.

In Ohio, it has been held that a judgment of divorce, even if it was obtained by fraud and perjury, may not afterwards be overturned in so far as it dissolved the marriage, but, if the court which rendered it did not have jurisdiction of the defendant,—the wife,—and assumed by the decree to cut her off from her property rights, she may, in order to establish such property rights, be relieved from the judgment after her husband's death. Bay v. Bay (1912) 85 Ohio St. 417, 98 N. E. 199.

In Wisconsin a former wife has been held entitled to maintain a suit in equity to set aside a decree of divorce fraudulently taken against her by her husband in his lifetime, after his death, against his administrator and heirs, in order to establish her rights in and to recover her share of the real and personal property of the deceased, as his lawful widow. Johnson v. Coleman (1868) 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193.

In Kentucky a decree of divorce procured by a husband after only a constructive service of process on his wife, by default, at a time when she was insane and confined in an asylum without the state, to which he had committed her, was held to be void and to constitute no defense to a bill in equity brought by the wife's next friend (she being incurably insane), after the death of the husband, against his second wife and her children by him, to recover dower and a L.R.A.1917B.

distributive share in his estate, and to set aside, so far as necessary to that end, his last will and testament. Newcomb v. Newcomb (1877) 13 Bush. (Ky.) 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222.

A defrauded spouse may bring a bill in equity in the state of New Jersey to enforce any civil right apparently taken away by a fraudulent decree of divorce, in a case where the decree itself cannot be attacked by a bill of review because the spouse who obtained it is dead. Givernaud v. Givernaud (1912) 81 N. J. Eq. 66, 85 Atl. 830.

In that state also it is held that, inasmuch as death dissolves a marriage, and therefore there can be no rehearing of a divorce suit after the spouse who procured it has died, appropriate relief against a decree obtained by a husband in an ex parte proceeding without personal service or appearance, by an intentionally fraudulent and false affidavit, to procure publication, may be had by bill in equity brought by the wife after his death, against his heirs and representatives, to reach and recover a share in his estate. Dyott v. Henderson (1916) 85 N. J. Eq. 338, 97 Atl. 35.

An action in the nature of a bill of revivor in which all the heirs at law and other persons interested in the real estate which belonged to a man who, in his lifetime, obtained a decree of divorce, and afterward died, has been said to be the only mode in New York by which the wife may obtain appropriate relief against the decree on the ground of fraud and irregularity in obtaining it, and her share and interest in the property left by the deceased. Watson v. Watson (1874) 1 Hun (N. Y.) 267.

In North Dakota an action to set aside a divorce for failure to comply with the statute in making constructive service by publication, brought after the death of a husband who obtained it, may be maintained by the divorced wife against his heirs, representatives, and other persons interested in his estate, to establish the plaintiff's status as his widow for the purpose of contesting his will, on the ground of fraud and undue influence. Dallas v. Luster (1914) 27 N. D. 450, 147 N. W. 95.

A divorced wife may, in Wisconsin, it is said, after the death of her former husband, maintain a suit in equity against his heirs and personal representatives, to annul the judgment of divorce in a proper case on sufficient grounds, in order to get the status of his widow and reach a widow's share in the deceased's estate. Moyer v. Koontz (1899) 103 Wis. 22, 74 Am. St. Rep. 837, 79 N. W. 50.

It was held by Brown, J., of the New York supreme court, in Rundle v. Van Inwegan (1886) 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 328, that a wife domiciled in New Jersey, whose husband left her permanently to take up his domicile in Indiana, where, without personal service upon her, and without her appearing, he afterwards obtained a divorce from her, was his lawful widow and entitled to dower in his real estate, notwithstanding she had married another man upon the faith of the validity of the divorce, had issue by him, and was suing in his name as wife.

In Kansas, however, it has been held that the fact that the statements in the petition for a divorce and in the affidavit for service of the summons by publication and to dispense with mailing were false, and so known to be by the plaintiff, does not, they being sufficient on their face, make a decree subsequently obtained so absolutely void that it can be successfully attacked by the spouse against whom it was rendered after the death of the party who got it, in an action to annul the latter's last will and to recover the property and estate thereby devised and bequeathed. Larimer v. Knoyle (1890) 43 Kan. 338, 23 Pac. 487.

In Washington it has been held that a judgment of divorce could not be disturbed after the death of the spouse who obtained it, despite the fact that it took away property rights; because, it was said, divorce is a purely personal action, which does not survive the death of either litigant; and, therefore, in the case at bar there existed no party interested to defend an action to set aside the decree. Dwyer v. Nolan (1905) 40 Wash. 459, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 551, 111 Am. St. Rep. 919, 82 Pac. 746, 5 Ann. Cas. 890.

In a contest between a divorced wife and her successor, over the administration of the estate of the deceased husband, the decree of divorce obtained by him by default upon a constructive service cannot be successfully attacked in California because of a defective or imperfect complaint in the action in which it was granted. Re James (1893) 99 Cal. 374, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, 33 Pac. 1122.

A court, in a suit by a divorced woman to recover a widow's share in the estate of her deceased former husband, will not annul the decree of divorce he obtained against her upon a constructive service, grounded on a fatally defective affidavit, and entered by a default prematurely taken, where the evidence she adduces conclusively establishes that good, meritorious, and sufficient grounds existed to sustain the decree. Carr v. Carr (1892) 92 Ky. 552, 36 Am. St. Rep. 614, 18 S. W. 453.

A divorce obtained by a man from his wife upon sufficient evidence, in open court, in proceedings regular in form, upon a constructive service by publication, cannot, after the lapse of many years, another marriage by him, and his death, leaving children born of the new marriage, be overthrown on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, in a suit by the divorced wife and her daughter, against the widow and her children, for an accounting and division of the deceased's estate, and to cancel a deed he made to defendants while living, alleged to be in fraud of the plaintiffs' rights. Hester v. Hester (1912) 103 Miss. 13, 60 So. 6, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 428.

A wife who causelessly deserted her husband and lived in adultery for years with another man, and who, upon learning that her husband had obtained a decree of divorce from her, married her paramour and afterwards continuously cohabited with him as his wife, will not be permitted, after her first husband's death, successfully to attack the validity of the decree of divorce for the purpose of acquiring his estate, even where, in proper circumstances, that decree might be adjudged void for lack of due service of process. Arthur v. Israel (1890) 15 Colo. 147, 10 L.R.A. 693, 22 Am. St. Rep. 381, 25 Pac. 81.

A woman divorced from her husband by a court of competent jurisdiction which had jurisdiction of him cannot, after the lapse of several years, in a controversy respecting her dower in his lands, attack the validity of the divorce granted her on the ground that she procured the subpoena to her husband to be issued in vacation, and but a fortnight before the term, when the statute required an interval of a month, because, assuming that she is not estopped by years of acquiescence, the objection rests upon an irregularity that does not make the decree void, but leaves it open merely to a direct assault in the court which granted it. Multimore v. Multimore (1861) 40 Pa. 151.

That a wife voluntarily separating from her husband, and entering into articles of separation with him, was induced by his fraud and deceit, having no means of knowing the value and amount of his property, to accept a substantial but grossly disproportionate and inadequate sum of money in complete settlement and satisfaction of all her claims for alimony and upon the husband's estate, does not constitute such a fraud as will enable her, after the husband's death, and discovery of the truth respecting his estate, to maintain an action to set aside a decree of divorce from her husband obtained by her in a suit brought for the purpose, upon the ground of the separation, undefended by the husband, for the purpose of getting a larger share of his estate as his widow. Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447.

This case was followed in Routledge v. Patterson (1911) 146 Wis. 226, 131 N. W. 346, in which a divorce was attacked upon similar grounds and for a like purpose.

For a divorced wife to maintain a suit in equity against the heirs and representatives of her former husband after his death, to annul the divorce granted him, for the purpose of establishing her status as his widow and reaching a widow's share in his estate, it is essential that there be within the state some property to be affected when none of the heirs or representatives is a resident, or can be served with process, except constructively, by publication. Moyer v. Koontz (1899) 103 Wis. 22, 74 Am. St. Rep. 837, 79 N. W. 50.

Inasmuch as a divorce suit abates with the death of either spouse, a decree may not legally be granted after one of them has died, and, if inadvertently or erroneously granted, will, upon petition, be set aside and held for naught. Dunham v. Dunham (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 395, 89 Atl. 281.

XXXIII. Effect on attacks on divorces of new marriage by spouse granted decree.

If, after a decree of divorce has been granted in Kentucky, and before it is set aside, either party contracts another marriage, the power of the court to vacate the decree it granted is at an end, even when the application to set it aside is made at the same term. Droste v. Droste (1910) 138 Ky. 53, 127 S. W. 506.

But Kentucky in this respect appears to be unique.

The right of one injured by a decree of divorce procured by a fraud, or fraudulently prevented from learning of the pendency of the divorce suit, or from appearing and defending it, to have the decree obtained set aside, may and in some cases does survive the remarriage L.R.A.1917B.

of the party who obtained the divorce. Day v. Nottingham (1902) 160 Ind. 408, 66 N. E. 998.

It is almost universally held throughout the United States that the marriage to another spouse of one who obtained by fraud a divorce from the former spouse is not of itself a sufficient reason for denying relief to the latter in a suit or other proceeding to set aside the tainted decree. Scanlan v. Scanlan (1891) 41 Ill. App. 449; Maher v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1900) 95 Ill. App. 365; Lawrence v. Nelson (1901) 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L.R.A. 583, 85 N. W. 84; Holmes v. Holmes (1874) 63 Me. 420; Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84; True v. True (1861) 6 Minn. 458, Gil. 315; Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086; Smith v. Smith (1854) 20 Mo. 166; Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551; Miller v. Miller (1914) 37 Nev. 257, 142 Pac. 218; Wortman v. Wortman (1863) 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 66; Kellow v. Kellow (1886) 1 Lehigh Valley L. Rep. (Pa.) 202.

Especially where the perpetrator of the successful fraud hastily contracted a new marriage after obtaining the divorce. Comstock v. Adams (1880) 23 Kan. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 191; Simpkins v. Simpkins (1914) 14 Mont. 386, 43 Am. St. Rep. 641, 36 Pac. 759.

The hasty marriage of a man who had procured a decree of divorce from his wife by default, occasioned by the unfaithful betrayal of her rights by her attorney, to his alleged paramour, furnishes no reason for denying the wife's motion, promptly made, to set aside the decree and open the case for her defense. Nichells v. Nichells (1895) 5 N. D. 125, 33 L.R.A. 515, 57 Am. St. Rep. 540, 64 N. W. 73.

The petition of a wife to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband by grossly fraudulent means, clearly proved, cannot be defeated by his marriage after procuring the decree, to another woman, where the marriage took place so soon after the decree was granted that no speed or diligence of the wronged wife in applying to vacate the decree could have prevented it. Whitcomb v. Whitcomb (1877) 46 Iowa, 437.

The remarriage of the successful party to a decree of divorce is not of itself an answer to an attack on the decree in equity, on the ground of fraud in obtaining it and condonation during the pendency of the divorce action, where the complainant has been guilty of no laches and was actually contesting the validity of the decree when the second marriage took place. Womack v. Womack (1904) 73 Ark. 281, 83 S. W. 937, 1136.

The fact that a husband who obtained by a plain and clearly proved fraud upon both the court and his wife a decree of divorce afterwards married another and an innocent woman, by whom he had children, will not avail to defeat a bill of review, brought after the lapse of years, to set aside the fraudulent decree, where the complainant shows the highest diligence on her part, and clearly explains and excuses her seeming laches. Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548.

The marriage to another woman of a man who, by means of a false return of personal service, obtained a divorce from his absent wife by default, will not prevent the setting aside of the decree. Stephens v. Stephens (1884) 62 Tex. 337.

When a man has, after obtaining a divorce from his wife by default, upon her failure to appear for trial, well knowing the existence of good reasons to excuse the default, married another woman, his second marriage is not a reason sufficient to justify refusing the defaulting first wife leave and opportunity to contest, on the merits, his right to a divorce. Scripture v. Scripture (1893) 70 Hun, 432, 24 N. Y. Supp. 301.

The fact that one who obtained a divorce by fraud afterwards contracted and had issue by a new marriage with an innocent third person is not a bar to a suit to set the divorce aside. Allen v. Maclellan (1849) 12 Pa. 328, 51 Am. Dec. 608; Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341.

The power of a court to set aside a decree of divorce cannot be taken away by the act of the party who procured it, in marrying again. Comstock v. Adams (1880) 23 Kan. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 191.

The power of a court to set aside, upon good grounds, a decree of divorce, is not impaired by the subsequent marriage of the spouse to whom it was granted, even where a child has been born, the fruit of the second marriage. Medina v. Medina (1896) 22 Colo. 146, 43 Pac. 1001.

Reasons of public policy and regard to the consequences which might ensue to innocent persons from the exercise of the power to invalidate a decree of divorce after it had become res judicata are insufficient grounds for denying that the power exists. Edson v. Edson (1867) 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393.

The circumstance that one who has obtained a decree of divorce upon constructive service and by default has married again is not sufficient to prevent the opening of the decree and the granting of a new trial in a proper case, upon a seasonable application, in virtue of an authorizing general statute. Meyar v. Meyar (1860) 3 Met. (Ky.) 298. As the court put it: With the consequences that may result to others from the judgment complained of we have nothing to do. If wrong has been done, it is attributable alone to appellant's conduct.

The marriage to another woman and the procreation of children by her of a husband who had procured a decree of divorce by constructive service and default from his insane wife while she was under his control in an asylum without the state is not an insurmountable obstacle to nullifying the decree through a suit in equity. Newcomb v. Newcomb (1877) 13 Bush (Ky.) 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222.

The fact that a woman who procured a divorce upon unfounded charges that her husband had deserted her, when he was merely traveling on business, and procured an illegal order for publication of the summons, upon a false affidavit that she knew not his whereabouts, when she was in constant and regular correspondence with him all the time,—married and had a child by another man,—will not suffice to defeat the wronged husband's motion to set aside the decree of divorce, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Crouch v. Crouch (1872) 30 Wis. 667.

The fact that a man who, by a wilfully false affidavit to publish the summons in a suit for divorce, and its publication in a newspaper printed in German, of purpose to keep it from his wife's knowledge, obtained a decree of divorce by default from his wife, within a year afterwards married another woman, presumably innocent, will not defeat the motion of his first wife to set aside the fraudulent decree, where she had no knowledge of its existence until more than a year after the second marriage, and moved as soon as she could acquire the means. Everett v. Everett (1884) 60 Wis. 200, 18 N. W. 637.

The marriage of a husband in the face of a clause forbidding him to marry again, in a decree of divorce obtained from him by his wife, affords no reason for denying her application to set aside the decree in her favor, upon the ground that she was misled, deceived, and coerced by him into bringing the suit, for the corrupt purpose on his part of gaining freedom from her. Lake v. Lake (1908) 124 App. Div. 89, 108 N. Y. Supp. 964.

The Iowa supreme court, after holding in Rush v. Rush (1877) 46 Iowa, 648, 26 Am. Rep. 179, a petition to set aside a divorce procured by fraud, good on demurrer, notwithstanding it did not allege that the defendant had not married again, denied an application for a rehearing, and filed a supplemental opinion, in which it said: In overruling the demurrer we were of the opinion that the court below did not err. . . . If it is true that the defendant was not a resident of M— county, then the court did not acquire jurisdiction, and the authorities are abundant . . . that where there is a lack of jurisdiction through the fraud of the plaintiff in the action for divorce, the decree may be declared void. What would be the effect of fraud on the part of the plaintiff in the action if the court had acquired jurisdiction it was not necessary for us to determine, and it is proper that the decision should be limited strictly to the question raised. (1878) 48 Iowa, 701.

That a woman was granted permission to marry again in a decree of divorce which she fraudulently procured by false testimony which imposed upon the court neither precludes the court from setting the decree aside after notice and hearing at the same term, nor requires her intended second husband to have notice of and opportunity to be heard in the proceedings, in the absence of explicit proof that an actual marriage ceremony had been performed. Todhunter v. DeGraff (1914) 164 Iowa, 567, 146 N. W. 66.

Although a new marriage to another spouse of one who succeeded in obtaining a divorce by a fraud or other means which prevented a defense to the suit is not of itself sufficient to defeat a suit in equity or other appropriate proceeding to set aside the decree, it is always a factor, and an important one, in determining whether or not relief from the decree shall be granted. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086; Leveridge v. Leveridge (1911) — N. J. Eq. —, 79 Atl. 422.

A stronger case to vacate a divorce is ordinarily required where the successful party has remarried than if the status of the parties has remained unchanged. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576; Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App 548; Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017.

While a second marriage and issue by it of one who obtained a divorce do not of themselves preclude a court of equity from setting the divorce aside when properly impeached for fraud and collusion, yet they are circumstances to make the court hesitate and scrutinize closely the evidence tainting the decree. Whittley v. Whittley (1908) 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078.

The fact that a husband divorced in a suit brought in the wife's name married again and has children alive by the second wife is a circumstance to be taken into account in estimating the sufficiency and weight of contradicted testimony adduced by the first wife to excuse her apparent laches in delaying seven years to bring a suit in equity to annul the decree. Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581.

It is admittedly proper and right for a court in which a decree of divorce is attacked for fraud or other misconduct in procuring it to act with caution and protect as far as possible an innocent third person who may have married the spouse who obtained the divorce. Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27; Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84; Nichols v. Nichols (1874) 25 N. J. Eq. 60.

The courts manifest a justifiable reluctance to annul decrees of divorce after the spouses who have obtained them have, on the faith of them, contracted new marriages with innocent third persons. Maier v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1900) 95 Ill. App. 365; Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341; Dunn v. Dunn (1834) 4 Paige (N. Y.) 425; Scripture v. Scripture (1893) 70 Hun, 432, 24 N. Y. Supp. 301.

Although a delay of about a month, even without explanation or excuse, by a wife in applying to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband on default, and for leave to come in and defend his suit, where she was personally served, but irregularly, because outside the state, and where an official copy of the decree was exhibited to her immediately after it was granted, was held too short to warrant the court in denying her application and ordering the decree to stand as conclusive, still, inasmuch as the husband had, in the intervening time, contracted another marriage with an innocent woman on the faith of the decree, equity allowed it to stand until the determination of the suit and the establishment of the divorced wife's defense, to protect the rights of the second wife. Dunn v. Dunn (1834) 4 Paige (N. Y.) 425.

When a man has married again after obtaining a decree of divorce from his first wife by default, if she makes a seasonable motion to be allowed to defend his suit, and shows a good defense upon the merits and a good excuse for failing to appear for trial, the judgment against her will be opened on just terms and the case heard on the merits; but, out of regard for the innocent second wife, the decree will be allowed to stand to abide the event, and cohabitation with her in the meantime cannot be esteemed adulterous. Scripture v. Scripture (1893) 70 Hun, 432, 24 N. Y. Supp. 301.

While a court may have the power in its discretion to set aside a decree of divorce in the public interest, where a fraud which prevented a defense has been charged, and a meritorious defense existed, yet where there was a personal service of process, conflicting testimony concerning the alleged fraud, negligence in not setting up a defense, and a second marriage of the successful spouse after a lapse of time sufficient in law to make remarriage lawful, a refusal to vacate the decree is no abuse of judicial discretion, and not the subject of review on appeal. Faulkner v. Faulkner (1916) 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404.

The circumstances that a man who had obtained a divorce from his wife, and had its validity affirmed in an independent adversary suit subsequently brought, in reliance upon two judgments in his favor, in good faith married and had offspring by another woman, apparently contributed to the defeat of his divorced wife in a subsequent action for support and maintenance, based on allegations that the divorce was obtained by fraud and its benefits accepted under duress. Bidwell v. Bidwell (1905) 139 N. C. 402, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, 111 Am. St. Rep. 797, 52 S. E. 55.

Reasons of public policy and regard to the consequences which may ensue to innocent third persons from overturning decrees of divorce after they have become res judicata, while forceful, are, however, nothing more than considerations moving courts to exercise their power to set aside divorces with great caution, and only in cases where the rights of the aggrieved are quite clear and have been insisted upon in due season, without an imputation of negligence. Edson v. Edson (1867) 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393.

A court has little reluctance in annulling a decree of divorce obtained by a man pursuant to a corrupt understanding with his wife to suppress evidence which, if disclosed, would have moved the court to refuse the decree, in case of a second marriage by him to another woman in pari delicto with him in the enterprise. Winder v. Winder (1910) 86 Neb. 495, 125 N. W. 1095.

A paramour who conspired with a man to obtain a divorce from his wife at the same time that she was procuring one from her husband does not, by marrying him as soon as both decrees have been granted, gain any equity worthy of judicial consideration against the wronged wife, seeking to set aside the divorce against her on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Wisdom v. Wisdom (1888) 24 Neb. 551, 8 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 N. W. 594.

It is quite as proper and important in a court before which a divorce is attacked to protect a wronged husband or wife and their innocent children against a fraudulent decree as it is to protect an innocent third person who may have married the spouse who obtained the tainted decree. Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27.

A court, it has been well said, cannot suffer itself to be used fraudulently by a man reckless of his initial marriage obligations, as an instrumentality for wronging his first wife, merely to protect his second wife. Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84.

The wrong suffered by and the hardship to a second wife of a man who obtained a decree of divorce from his first wife by a plain fraud upon her and the court are no greater and require no higher consideration than the wrong suffered by and the hardship to the first wife when she attacks the decree in equity and establishes both the fraud and her own diligence. Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548.

As one court has remarked, a legal wife at least is as much entitled to have her status preserved as an unfortunate and possibly duped woman who mistakenly thought herself to be the second wife, to have her status justified and established. Sampson v. Sampson (Mass.) supra.

According to one court the marital rights of a lawful wife divorced by fraudulent means are at least equal to those of another woman, however innocent herself, who afterwards married the husband, and the first wife cannot be robbed of her rights by fraud, nor can the recreant husband profit by his fraud and the innocence of another woman whom he married. McConkey v. McConkey (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 187 S. W. 1100.

The second wife of a man divorced by fraud from his first one, it has been said, is no more placed in extremis than is any woman who innocently marries a married man. Her misfortune is imputable to nothing but the guilt of her husband, or, perhaps, to a carelessness of her own. On the other hand, if a decree fraudulently obtained cannot be vacated, then the court can be used by a reckless man as an instrumentality to deprive an innocent wife of a support from her husband, of the right to dower in his estate, of the possession of her children, besides stamping her name, it may be, with an unmerited disgrace. Such a retribution should not fall upon her, at least. Holmes v. Holmes (1874) 63 Mo. 420.

XXXIV. Attacks on parts of decrees of divorce.

a. Generally.

Attacks upon decrees of divorce which do not question their validity and rightfulness so far as they dissolve the marriage, but merely seek to annul or materially to change other parts of them, notably their provisions respecting divisions of property between the spouses, the payment of alimony, and the custody and support of the children, have been frequently made with varying degrees of success and failure.

An early decision in Iowa declared that if a decree of divorce was voidable for fraud, its infirmity was total, and therefore a bill in equity which sought to set it aside only so far as it affected the property rights of the complainant, and left it unassailed as a dissolution of the marriage, could not be maintained. McCraney v. McCraney (1857) 5 Iowa, 233, 68 Am. Dec. 702.

This case was criticized by the supreme court of Missouri upon another point; it was said to be against the great weight of authority in the United States in sanctioning the doctrine that a statute commanding petitions or their verifications in divorce suits to allege the absence of collusion, etc., was not so mandatory as to invalidate a divorce granted without conformity to its requirements. Hinkle v. Lovelace (1907) 204 Mo. 208, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 730, 120 Am. St. Rep. 698, 102 S. W. 1015, 11 Ann. Cas. 794.

In other states where suits have been brought or other proceedings have been instituted to change or annul parts of decrees of divorce without affecting them so far as they dissolved marriages, the courts have either granted in whole or in part, or refused the relief sought upon other grounds than acquiescence in the assailed judgment as a dissolution of marriage.

b. In respect of alimony.

A decree of divorce which omits, as a result of the defendant's fraud, to allow the plaintiff alimony granted in a suit wherein alimony was a part of the prayed-for relief, may be opened and made to award alimony without affecting the dissolution of the marriage. Re Smith (1906) 74 Kan. 452, 87 Pac. 189.

While by statute the Kentucky court of appeals is powerless to disturb a decree of divorce so far as it operates to dissolve the marital relation, yet, if, in granting such a decree, the court does not make a suitable provision for the wife,—allowing her nothing at all, too little, or too much,—an appeal will lie from that part of the decree, and the court of appeals may, at the instance of the litigant aggrieved by it, examine and reverse it if wrong has been done. Bourne v. Simpson (1849) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 454.

A decree of divorce obtained by default upon service by publication, so far as it awards alimony out of the defendant's property, may be successfully attacked and set aside by bill in equity upon proof that the awarded alimony was based upon fraud and perjury respecting the ownership of the property. Klaes v. Klaes (1897) 103 Iowa, 689, 72 N. W. 777.

A bill in equity by a divorced wife lies to set aside the decree for alimony awarded her husband, and to annul a mortgage given by him to secure his attorney's fees and advances, where such award was obtained by means of false testimony that the mortgaged real estate had been purchased with the husband's money, and the legal title taken in the wife's name. Ibid.

A man estopped by afterwards marrying another woman from attacking the validity of a divorce dissolving his marriage to his former wife by a decree she obtained in a foreign state by default, upon a constructive service, is not estopped from contesting the validity of an amendment made to that decree, without notice to him, without his knowledge, and after his second marriage had taken place, by which alimony was awarded to his former spouse, and a personal judgment against him for the amount of it was rendered. Hekking v. Pfaff (1898) 43 L.R.A. 618, 33 C. C. A. 328, 50 U. S. App. 484, 91 Fed. 60.

An unreasonable and excessive allowance of alimony in a decree of divorce is not a ground for annulling the judgment, because an application to reduce it affords a sufficient remedy. O'Brien v. D'Hemecourt (1907) 118 La. 996, 43 So. 654.

A judgment for alimony in a divorce suit will not be vacated by a court of equity on the ground that it rested upon false testimony. Mengel v. Mengel (1909) 145 Iowa, 737, 120 N. W. 72, 122 N. W. 899.

A defense to an action to recover alimony that so much of the decree of divorce as awarded alimony was procured by a fraud of the plaintiff upon the court, acquiesced in by defendant because of false representations to him by the plaintiff respecting the state of her health, is bad on demurrer for the reason that the alleged fraud consisted of matters which the court had to consider in granting the decree. Cheever v. Kelly (1915) 96 Kan. 269, 150 Pac. 529.

A decree of divorce awarding alimony, granted to a wife for the husband's fault, pursuant to his agreement, when not in anywise affected by mistake or fraud, cannot, after the term at which it was granted has expired, be modified on the husband's motion. Stanfield v. Stanfield (1908) 22 Okla. 574, 98 Pac. 334.

A decree of divorce rendered by default upon a service by publication only, without any appearance by the defendant, containing no reservation of jurisdiction over the subject of costs and alimony, may not be altered, amended, or modified so as to impose on the defendant an obligation to pay alimony or costs, notwithstanding a statute empowering a court or judge to set aside, alter, or modify a decree of divorce at any time after making it, so as to provide for appointing trustees to care for and have the custody of minor children, or for the maintenance of either party. McFarlane v. McFarlane (1903) 43 Or. 477, 73 Pac. 203, 75 Pac. 139.

The statutory prohibition in Indiana against reviewing decrees and proceedings in divorce suits renders actions to review judgments in attachment for alimony not maintainable, irrespective of the consideration that the attachment is not an independent but merely a provisional remedy in aid of the suit. L.R.A.1917B.

Keller v. Keller (1894) 139 Ind. 38, 38 N. E. 337.

A decree of divorce granted by default to a woman from her husband upon a constructive service by publication only, upon the ground of desertion, awarding her as alimony color of title to a slave owned by him, may be avoided by him on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, conspiracy and false testimony, in a later action to recover the possession or value of the slave, brought by him against the wife and her grantees of such slave, charging them with having knowingly participated in the fraud and conspiracy. Plummer v. Plummer (1859) 37 Miss. 185, Handy, J., dissenting.

A judgment of divorce containing provisions awarding alimony, and apportioning community property, granted upon the false testimony of the husband, wilfully designed to undervalue, and conceal the quantity and worth of his possessions, where the wife could not, by any reasonable diligence, ascertain the amount and value of the community property, and was compelled to depend wholly upon the husband's testimony,—should be set aside at her suit, as having been fraudulently obtained. McMurray v. McMurray (1887) 67 Tex. 665, 4 S. W. 357.

When a wife had the opportunity to discover an alleged fraud of her husband respecting the values of his properties divided between her and him by a decree of divorce, and had full knowledge of all the items composing his estate, her delay for three years to move to set aside the decree is laches sufficient to bar her from relief. Ferry v. Ferry (1894) 9 Wash. 239, 37 Pac. 431.

It is not a ground for setting aside a judgment for divorce that the husband concealed from the court and his wife community property, since such property retains its community character, and the wife's rights in it are unaffected by the decree. Meisenheimer v. Meisenheimer (1909) 55 Wash. 32, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1005, 104 Pac. 159.

A divorce granted, to a wife upon her cross bill in her husband's suit will not be set aside on the ground that he committed a fraud upon her by undervaluing his property, or that she was awarded a smaller share of it than she should have had, when such property consisted of sundry pieces of real estate, all known to her, and the true value of which she might easily have ascertained. Ferry v. Ferry (Wash.) supra.

A portion of a decree of divorce awarding the custody of a minor child of the marriage thereby dissolved to the spouse who obtained it may be shown to have been obtained by fraud of the successful party in a proceeding of habeas corpus by the other spouse, to recover possession of the child. Milner v. Gatlin (1915) 143 Ga. 816, L.R.A.1916B, 977, 85 S. E. 1045, Atkinson, J., dissenting.

So much of a decree of divorce as awarded to a husband the custody of the minor children of the marriage, and which was procured by his deception and fraud upon the wife, may be set aside at her suit, and the right to the custody of the children may be re-examined and again determined. Trammell v. Trammell (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 80 S. W. 119.

The provisions of a decree of divorce requiring the payment of stated sums of money for the support of the children of the dissolved marriage may, in a proper action or proceeding, subsequently brought, be modified so as to reduce such sums, upon proof that a change in the circumstances and ability of the party ordered to pay them has occurred since the decree was made. Julian v. Julian (1916) — Ind. App. —, 111 N. E. 196.

A decree of divorce awarding the successful spouse the custody of the children of the marriage, granted where the defendant had due notice, full opportunity to be heard, and was heard, is final and not open to any change or modification upon a subsequent application, so long as no change occurs in the circumstances in which it was granted, and where the only existing statute empowering the court to modify such a decree in respect of the custody of children limits the power to cases in which circumstances render changes expedient. Youde v. Youde (1907) 136 Iowa, 719, 114 N. W. 190.

A decree of divorce granted a wife after her petition had been amended by consent, and when the husband had appeared, but failed wilfully to answer, awarding the custody of a child of the marriage and reasonable alimony to the wife, should not be set aside and changed upon a subsequent application by the husband, where the only statute that applies to such cases requires a joinder of both parties in a petition to vacate a L.R.A.1917B.

decree of divorce. Bristow v. Bristow (1899) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 481, 51 S. W. 819.

It is not a ground for setting aside a judgment of divorce, and allowing a wife to come in and answer after default on personal service, that it in terms "wholly" releases the husband from his duty and obligation to support and educate the children of the marriage, when a statute is in force, authorizing the courts, from time to time, to revise and alter decrees of divorce in respect of the care, custody, education, and maintenance of the children of the dissolved marriage. Lessig v. Lessig (1908) 136 Wis. 403, 117 N. W. 792.

A husband who has been forbidden to marry again in a decree of divorce obtained by his wife after due notice to him and an opportunity to defend on the ground that he had abandoned her for some years because of his religious belief and opinion that marriage was unlawful and void,—a condition of mind which rendered him unfit for the matrimonial state,—should not be granted leave to marry again on his subsequent petition for modification of the decree in that particular, without proof of recantation. Child's Case (1872) 109 Mass. 406.

It is said to be settled law in Alabama that any attempt to impeach and annul a judgment other than by a direct appeal or a direct proceeding in the court which rendered it, before the term at which it was rendered expired, is a collateral attack; but, in that association, it was added that this, of course, does not deny the well-settled jurisdiction of equity to review judgments founded on fraud, accident, or mistake. Johnson v. Johnson (1913) 182 Ala. 376, 62 So. 706.

It has been doubted in the same state whether any excuse is necessary for not applying for relief against a decree to the court which made it, before resorting to equity to set it aside; but the doubt was expressed in a case where the excuse made was ample. Rittenberry v. Wharton (1912) 176 Ala. 390, 58 So. 293.

But then again, the same court has held that a complainant in equity, to set aside a judgment at law on the ground of fraud, accident, or surprise, being bound to show due diligence, must show as a condition of obtaining relief that application was made to be relieved from the judgment, to the court which rendered it, during the term, or else set forth a valid reason for not making such an application. Hendley v. Chabert (1914) 189 Ala. 258, 65 So. 993.

A bill in equity to set aside a decree fraudulently procured does not want equity in failing to allege an application for relief to the court which made it, where the evidence establishes that such an application was deferred until it was too late to make it, in reliance upon repeated promises by the successful litigant to do justice notwithstanding the decree. Rittenberry v. Wharton (Ala.) supra.

The possibility that a judgment of divorce would have been set aside for want of jurisdiction upon motion is not a bar to a suit in equity to annul it for fraud. Johnson v. Coleman (1868) 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193.

A court which granted a divorce will not set it aside on motion grounded upon the charge that it was procured by fraud, after the spouse who obtained it has died, but will leave the applicant to an action in the nature of a bill of review, in which the heirs at law and representatives of the decedent, and others interested in the real estate, may be made parties. Watson v. Watson (1874) 47 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 240; Groh v. Groh (1901) 35 Misc. 354, 71 N. Y. Supp. 985.

A decree of divorce obtained by a man since deceased cannot be set aside upon motion by the divorced wife, charging fraud and irregularity, upon notice to the administrator, no matter how clearly it may appear that the movant may be entitled to the relief sought if the facts stated by her are established. Watson v. Watson (1874) 1 Hun (N. Y.) 267.

XXXVI. Renewed attacks on divorces after failure of prior ones.

A motion to vacate a decree of divorce, made after the denial of a motion to continue the trial which resulted in the decree, and rested upon the same grounds as were relied upon to support the motion to continue, must, in turn, be denied. Richards v. Richards (1913) 24 Idaho, 87, 132 Pac. 576.

A suit to annul a judgment of divorce by one previously defeated in a motion to set aside the decree, and based upon grounds known to the plaintiff at the time the motion was made, some of which were, and all of which might have been, used to support the motion, cannot be maintained. Meisenheimer v. Meisen- L.R.A.1917B.

An original action by a husband against his wife, to annul a decree divorcing her from her former husband, is barred by the pendency of a suit previously brought by her against him for a divorce, in which he set up the defense that he had been induced to marry her by the false pretense that her divorce from her former husband was valid, and prayed by way of cross bill that such divorce be annulled upon the same grounds. Van Slyke v. Van Slyke (1914) 183 Mich. 536, 150 N. W. 114.

Once a judgment of divorce rendered after an appearance and defense has been attacked and declared valid in an independent contested suit in another jurisdiction it is not open to another attack in another action, based on the theory that it was fraudulently obtained. Bidwell v. Bidwell (1905) 139 N. C. 402, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, 111 Am. St. Rep. 797, 52 S. E. 55.

A wife who began and abandoned proceedings to annul a decree of divorce obtained by her husband by default on a constructive service, pursuant to a money settlement made under advice of counsel, was defeated in a later attack on the decree, based upon the alleged fact that it had been obtained by a fraud which she had not discovered until within the preceding six months. Peyton v. Peyton (1902) 28 Wash. 278, 68 Pac. 757.

Allegations in a bill in equity brought to reopen and set aside a judgment on appeal, of the supreme court, by which a decree in chancery which set aside a previous decree of divorce was reversed and the bill dismissed, setting forth, in substance, that the appellant had wrongfully and fraudulently smuggled into the record an ante-dated answer and cross bill "redundant in new matter," not stated or shown to be material, where the opinion of the supreme court discloses that the reversal was based upon the evidence taken on the trial, and not upon the pleadings fall short of showing the procurement of the judgment of reversal and dismissal attacked by fraud and imposition upon the court, and hence are insufficient to sustain the bill. Corney v. Corney (1913) 108 Ark. 415, 159 S. W. 20.

The dismissal on the merits, after a contested hearing, of a wife's complaint against her husband for a divorce, because of her failure to prove sufficient grounds to warrant a decree, does not revive and reinstate a previous decree obtained by her after an ex parte hearing upon a service by publication only, afterwards set aside by an order giving the husband leave to answer, from which no appeal was taken, where the wife subsequently dismissed the suit for the purpose of beginning anew. Cheyney v. Cheyney (1910) 163 Mich. 598, 128 N. W. 780.

The denial of a motion to set aside a decree granted by default, annulling a marriage, is no bar to a subsequent action to set aside the decree on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Blank v. Blank (1887) 107 N. Y. 91, 13 N. E. 615; Monroe v. Monroe (1893) 66 Hun, 635, 50 N. Y. S. R. 237, 21 N. Y. Supp. 655.

Although a petition by a complaining wife who had been divorced a mensa et thoro from her husband on the ground that he had deserted her, to set aside a subsequent decree obtained by him against her on the ground of her adultery, may not warrant the court in annulling the decree, yet, when such petition contains averments, though vague and general in form, of surprise, mistake, and fraudulent concealment of the earlier decree from the court which granted the latter, the dismissal of the petition may be accompanied by leave and be without prejudice to another and appropriate proceeding to obtain the desired relief. Foxwell v. Foxwell (1912) 118 Md. 471, 84 Atl. 552.

After the case had been remanded in accord with this decision, the petition was amended and the charges made in it were tried on the merits, with the result that the husband's decree was set aside, and, upon his appeal, this result was affirmed, in (1914) 122 Md. 263, 89 Atl. 494.

XXXVII. Attacks on divorces by other persons than divorced spouses.

a. In general.

The party aggrieved by a decree of divorce is the only party who can attack it in any way. Alderson v. Bell (1868) 9 Cal. 321; Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1888) 55 Cal. 384; Re Newman (1888) 75 Cal. 213, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, 16 Pac. 887.

It is for the legislature alone to determine to what extent public policy requires the right of any person other than the husband and wife to intervene in a divorce suit. Baugh v. Baugh (1877) 37 Mich. 59, 26 Am. Rep. 495.

b. By strangers.

If in any circumstances a judgment of L.R.A.1917B.

divorce can be annulled or opened at the suit of a stranger, a court is not called upon to interfere with it at the instance of those to whom its effects are of too remote and indirect a character to be legally harmful. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

A judgment of divorce, wholly void, may be attacked and nullified by any litigant whose rights it affects, in any action to establish those rights. Kwentsky v. Sirový (1909) 142 Iowa, 385, 121 N. W. 27; Plummer v. Plummer (1859) 37 Miss. 185.

c. By second spouses.

The second husband of a divorced wife cannot have his own marriage to her annulled on the ground that she was, when he married her, still the lawful wife of her former husband, and her decree was invalid by the failure of her petition to allege her residence in the county where she brought her suit. Werz v. Werz (1881) 11 Mo. App. 26.

The husband of a divorced woman has no cause of action to annul his marriage upon the ground that the divorce she obtained from her former husband was procured by fraud and collusion. Ruger v. Heckel (1881) 85 N. Y. 483.

Certainly not when he married her with knowledge of her former marriage and divorce suit. Hall v. Hall (1910) 139 App. Div. 120, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

A man who interested himself in and promoted the suit of a woman against her husband for a divorce, intending to marry her after she had procured a decree, cannot, after he has married her, maintain a suit to set aside her divorce, on the ground that she obtained it through a fraud on the court, which consciously or unintentionally he aided and abetted her in perpetrating. Van Slyke v. Van Slyke (1915) 186 Mich. 324, 152 N. W. 921.

A decree of divorce granted to a woman in regular proceedings by default, after a personal service, pursuant to statute, without the state, cannot be attacked by her second husband in his action for a divorce from her for alleged adultery, with counter charges by her of adultery and cruel treatment by him. Sodini v. Sodini (1905) 94 Minn. 301, 110 Am. St. Rep. 371, 102 N. W. 861.

An action by the second husband of a divorced woman to annul his marriage to her cannot be maintained upon the theory that the divorce granted her by a foreign court, which had jurisdiction over both the subject-matter and her and her former husband, was tainted with fraud so as to be invalid, because, in obtaining it, she had suppressed the fact that she had previously, in another suit, been refused a divorce, because she had been therein proved to have been guilty of adultery herself. Bater v. Bater, L. R. [1906] P. (Eng.) 209, 75 L. J. Prob. N. S. 60, 94 L. T. N. S. 835, 22 Times L. R. 408, 4 Ann. Cas. 854.

A motion by a defendant after cross appeals from a decree of divorce have been perfected, to remand the cause to the court below, with permission to him to amend his answer by setting up as an additional defense that his marriage to the plaintiff was void for the alleged reason that when it took place she was really the lawful wife of another man, then living, from whom she had been divorced by a decree invalid in law, being addressed to the discretion of the court, is properly denied on the ground of laches, where, notwithstanding his averment that he did not discover the invalidity of his wife's divorce from her former husband until after the appeals were taken, the record contradicts him by statements in his answer implying previous knowledge on his part, and by showing that his solicitor in the pending cause had appeared and contested the wife's decree as prosecuting attorney of the county, in behalf of an interested minor child, and had therefore full personal knowledge from the beginning of all the pertinent facts. Robson v. Robson (1910) 161 Mich. 293, 126 N. W. 216.

The widow of a man divorced in his lifetime is not entitled to maintain against his former wife a bill in equity to set aside the decree of divorce. Smith v. Smith (1914) 186 Ill. App. 540.

Unless some statute gives a right to a corespondent in a divorce to appear therein and contest the charges, the court has no power, upon a motion after judgment, to set aside the decree and open the case to allow the corespondent to disprove the charges. Quigley v. Quigley (1887) 45 Hun (N. Y.) 23.

A woman charged as paramour of an adulterous husband whose answer in his wife's action for divorce had been stricken out for failure to obey an order of court directing him to pay alimony cannot, by joining him in an application made while he continued in contempt of court for his disobedience, have the decree of divorce granted the wife set aside to enable her to disprove the charges upon which the decree was based. Ibid. L.R.A.1917B.

Although by statute the right may have been given to a corespondent to appear in a divorce suit to disprove charges of adultery, an application by one to stay the entry of an interlocutory decree in a wife's action for divorce until the issues raised by the applicant's proposed answer can be tried and determined, grounded solely upon the affidavit of an attorney, unsupported by the client's own denial of the charges, must be denied. Stafford v. Stafford (1915) 170 App. Div. 172, 156 N. Y. Supp. 25.

A defendant, in an action by a wronged husband for criminal conversation with his wife, cannot attack a decree of divorce obtained by the plaintiff from his wife, and offered in evidence to make her competent as a witness to prove the marriage and the offense charged, for the purpose of disqualifying her from testifying, at least, upon any ground falling short of making the decree wholly void for total lack of jurisdiction. Wottrich v. Freeman (1877) 71 N. Y. 601.

e. By children of divorced parents.

In the absence of any statute allowing the children of a divorced couple to attack the decree divorcing their parents on the ground that it was granted by collusion and fraud, a bill by them to set it aside will not lie. Baugh v. Baugh (1877) 37 Mich. 59, 26 Am. Rep. 495.

In a contest for the administration of a decedent's estate, between his son by his first wife and his second wife, a decree of divorce in reliance upon which the decedent married the second wife, obtained by the first wife in a suit brought in the county of the residence of the couple, while the defendant was incarcerated upon a conviction of felony, in the penitentiary in another county, cannot be annulled on the ground that the sheriff's return of service of process on the prisoner by leaving a copy of it at his residence with his wife—a legal service in ordinary cases—was null and void. McLeod v. McLeod (1915) 144 Ga. 359, 87 S. E. 286.

Two separate and independent divorces got upon constructive services by publication and default for want of appearances and defenses by two persons who afterwards intermarried, one from each of their respective former spouses, in proceedings filled with defects and irregularities sufficient to warrant annulment of both decrees upon direct attacks by the divorced spouses; cannot, after the man's death, be successfully attacked and overthrown in an action of ejectment brought by his daughter, born of his first wife, against the second wife, to recover real estate of which he died seised, claimed by defendant as widow. Pettiford v. Zoellner (1881) 45 Mich. 358, 8 N. W. 57.

The infant children born after a decree of divorce had been fraudulently obtained by their father, and when he had, at his own request, resumed marital relations and cohabited as before with his wife, and condoned her alleged offenses, if they ever existed, are entitled, if rectus in curia, to maintain after their father's death a bill in equity to annul the decree and establish their property rights in their father's estate. Rawlins v. Rawlins (1881) 18 Fla. 345.

f. By parent of divorced child.

The mother of an infant against whom a decree of divorce was granted has no legal interest in the litigation to support her application to have the decree set aside as collusive, and to be appointed a guardian ad litem to defend the suit. E. B. v. E. C. B. (1858) 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 44.

After both husband and wife are dead, their status while living is not open to judicial inquiry except in so far as the property rights of their survivors or heirs are affected. Wood v. Wood (1907) 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492.

An attack by a divorced wife, continued after her death testate by her devisees, by means of a suit to partition property of which her former husband died seised, brought upon the theory that she was his lawful widow, upon the decree of divorce, upon the ground that it was granted in a collusive suit, is not maintainable. Friebe v. Elder (1914) 181 Ind. 597, 105 N. E. 151.

After the death intestate of the second husband of a divorced woman in the lifetime of her first husband, the heirs at law of the deceased, who, but for the widow's rights in the estate, would have inherited his property, have no legal interest or standing sufficient to maintain a suit to annul the decree of divorce on the ground that it was procured by fraud and perjury. Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755.

Assuming that the husband of a wife divorced from a former husband might, while he lived, have maintained a suit to annul his marriage on the ground that the divorce, although prima facie valid, had not, because of sundry errors, omissions, and irregularities in the proceedings, been legally granted, yet, after his death without having questioned the decree, his heirs at law cannot maintain a bill in equity for such purpose. Richardson v. King (1912) 157 Iowa, 287, 135 N. W. 640.

The heirs of a deceased party to a decree of divorce, whose rights in real estate would be affected if the decree should be set aside, should be brought in as parties to a bill in equity filed to annul the decree for fraud, after the death of the party who obtained it. Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828.

To a suit in equity by the heirs at law of the second husband of a divorced woman, brought after he had died intestate, to set aside the decree of divorce obtained by her against her former husband, and to annul the second marriage, the divorced husband is an absolutely necessary party, without whose presence on the record the court will not proceed. Richardson v. King (Iowa) supra.

When an estoppel is relied upon to defeat an application or action to set aside, open, or modify a decree of divorce alleged to have been granted through fraud, duress, and undue influence, the facts out of which the supposed estoppel arises must be pleaded with particularity to be available as proof, and no inferences will be indulged to favor such plea. Holt v. Holt (1909) 23 Okla. 639, 102 Pac. 187.

A wife who co-operated and colluded with her husband for him to obtain a divorce from her by suppressing facts and by false testimony, and who remained quiescent for more than a year, knowing he had married another woman in the interim, is estopped to have the divorce set aside. Karren v. Karren (1902) 25 Utah, 87, 60 L.R.A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815, 69 Pac. 465.

A bill by a wife to set aside a decree of divorce previously procured by her on the ground that she had obtained it by collusion, without any proof of fraud by her husband, is properly dismissed when her bill suing for divorce alleged that there was no collusion, and was verified by her oath to the truth of its averments. Simons v. Simons (1881) 47 Mich. 253, 10 N. W. 360.

A wife sued by her husband for divorce, and not served with process, is estopped to deny the jurisdiction of the court over her person, on the ground that the attorney who entered an appearance for her and filed her answer had no authority to represent her, where she personally verified the answer and knew of the purpose of the suit. Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

A judgment of divorce rendered by a court of general jurisdiction in one state after a voluntary appearance by the defendant and knowledge and opportunity to defend, upon a collusive default, cannot be attacked and avoided, but is conclusive in an original suit in another state, brought by the beaten litigant against the successful one, for a divorce and alimony. Nichols v. Nichols (1874) 25 N. J. Eq. 60.

A general appearance by a wife in a divorce suit brought against her by her husband, in which she procured an amendment to be made to his bill that secured to her certain property subsequently obtained by her, when followed by inaction for many years, during which her husband married again, operates to estop her from maintaining a bill in equity to set aside the decree on the ground that the statute authorizing constructive service was not followed. Hereu v. Hereu (1899) 6 Ariz. 270, 56 Pac. 871.

A wife who knew in advance the purpose of her husband to sue for a divorce, and the charges he made against her as grounds for it, and who, because she preferred him to allege other and less obnoxious grounds than those he contemplated, authorized in writing an attorney to appear for her, and who then accepted money awarded her as alimony, is estopped, after her husband has married another woman, to maintain a bill in equity to set aside the decree on the ground that he was guilty of fraud in procuring it. Maher v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1900) 95 Ill. App. 365.

A man knowing that a woman he wishes to marry is the wife of another, and has brought suit to divorce her husband, in order to marry him, who marries her with full knowledge, after she has obtained a decree of divorce, is estopped in his subsequent suit to annul his marriage to her on the ground that she was, when it occurred, the lawful wife of another man, from impeaching the decree she obtained, for alleged fraud in procuring it. Hall v. Hall (1910) 139 App. Div. 120, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

A husband against whom his wife obtained a decree of divorce upon prima facie proof of his adultery, after his appearance and answer in her suit had been stricken out for failure to pay alimony allowed her pendente lite, cannot have the decree set aside and leave granted to come in and defend the action until he first purges himself of his contempt of court by complying with the order directing payment of the alimony. Quigley v. Quigley (1887) 45 Hun (N. Y.) 23.

A husband who, by collusion with his wife, employed an attorney to bring suit for her against him for divorce, is estopped afterwards to question the validity of the decree. Moor v. Moor (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 63 S. W. 347.

A spouse who obtained in a foreign state a decree of divorce is estopped from afterwards questioning its validity in the home state. Simmonds v. Simmonds (1912) 78 Misc. 571, 138 N. Y. Supp. 639.

A spouse who obtained a divorce in another state, containing permission to both parties to marry again, cannot, while it remains unassailed, maintain an action for divorce in this state, predicated upon an alleged adultery of the other spouse in marrying another person by virtue of the permission. Coddington v. Coddington (1860) 10 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 450.

A husband who, in his home state, obtained a decree divorcing him from his wife, has no legal interest or standing which will enable him to assail and set aside, on the ground of a fraudulent procurement, a decree of divorce previously obtained in another state by his wife, after she has married again, and when there are no property rights involved nor any issue of the dissolved marriage. Webster v. Webster (1880) 54 Iowa, 154, 6 N. W. 170.

b. By use of privileges or taking benefits of decree.

One cannot be relieved from a judgment of divorce after using the privileges it confers. Garner v. Garner (1871) 38 Ind. 139.

He cannot accept the benefits of a decree of divorce and not be bound by it. Van Sickle v. Harmeyer (1912) 172 Ill. App. 218.

Whoever takes the benefits of a decree of divorce must bear its burdens. Garner v. Garner (Ind.) supra.

And one who obtains a decree of divorce and accepts the benefits it confers will not be heard afterwards to question its validity. Van Slyke v. Van Slyke (1915) 186 Mich. 324, 152 N. W. 921.

A decree of divorce, entered by consent, will not be set aside at the suit of the spouse who accepted its benefits, brought after the death of the other spouse, for the purpose of obtaining a share in the latter's estate. Mallory v. Mallory (1911) 160 Ill. App. 471.

c. By accepting alimony, money, or property.

The acceptance by a wife having full knowledge of the facts, of alimony allowed her in a decree of divorce granted to her husband, has been held to be one element, in combination with others, helping to estop her from setting aside the decree despite the existence of good grounds for annulling it. Maher v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1900) 95 Ill. App. 365; Mohler v. Shank (1895) 93 Iowa, 273, 34 L.R.A. 161, 57 Am. St. Rep. 274, 61 N. W. 981; Bourne v. Simpson (1849) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 454.

A wife who, knowingly and voluntarily, accepts a sum of money and a conveyance of property awarded her as alimony in a decree of divorce granted to her husband, is afterwards and thereby estopped from contesting its validity. Agnew's Appeal (1883) 3 Walk. (Pa.) 320.

A woman sued for divorce, and charged with adultery and gross neglect of marital duty, who, in consideration of the withdrawal of the charge of adultery and the payment of a stated sum of money as alimony, agreed not to oppose the granting of a decree, after her husband has fulfilled the conditions and paid the money, is estopped to have the decree opened and the satisfaction of it annulled. Neely v. Neely (1884) 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 201.

A woman in whose name and by whose authority, when not residing within the state, an attorney instituted and prosecuted to judgment a suit for divorce against her husband, and to whom a decree was granted carrying alimony which she accepted, cannot, after the death of her divorced husband and the lapse of many years, be permitted to impeach the decree for want of jurisdiction in the court to entertain her suit and grant it, because she lacked the qualifying residence the statute prescribed. Ellis v. White (1883) 61 Iowa, 644, 17 N. W. 28.

The acceptance of alimony awarded a woman in a decree of divorce obtained by her husband in a suit of which she had due notice and in which she regularly appeared, coupled with her subsequent marriage to her paramour and the birth of a child by him, has been held to estop her from attacking the decree, despite the court's lack of jurisdiction. L.R.A.1917B.

A woman who was personally served, who voluntarily appeared and deliberately made default in a suit by her husband in another state for a divorce from her, under the laws thereof, and who afterwards, for a substantial pecuniary consideration, by him paid and by her freely accepted, executed and delivered a release which recited the divorce, and discharged him and his estate from all her claims upon either, cannot overturn the decree by a subsequent suit against him in the home state for a divorce, on the theory that she continued his lawful wife. Loud v. Loud (1880) 129 Mass. 14.

A judgment of divorce obtained upon legal grounds by a man after his wife had withdrawn her defense in consideration of the payment to her of a sum of money deemed at the time sufficient for her support and maintenance will not afterwards be set aside at her instance merely because she became dissatisfied, and hoped to obtain a larger allowance. Wiemer v. Wiemer (1911) 21 N. D. 371, 130 N. W. 1015.

A woman from whom her husband obtained a decree of divorce, and who, upon the strength of it, brought an action against him as an unmarried woman to recover certain personal property in his possession, belonging to her by gift from her father, which she successfully prosecuted to judgment, is estopped by her conduct from afterwards questioning the validity of the divorce, and is barred against relief from it by appeal. Baily v. Baily (1863) 44 Pa. 274, 84 Am. Dec. 439.

A wife who, having been personally served in a suit for divorce brought by her husband against her in another state, under the laws thereof, appeared and deliberately defaulted therein, and afterwards, for a substantial and acceptable money payment, released him and his estate from all her claims, cannot treat his subsequent marriage and cohabitation with another woman as a violation of his marriage bond to her, not so much upon a theory of estoppel as because her own conduct amounted to conniving at or acquiescing in the later marriage. Loud v. Loud (Mass.) supra.

A wife who appeared and contested her husband's divorce suit in a foreign state, accepted payment of a large sum of money awarded her by the judgment granting a divorce to her husband, delayed over six years to bring a suit in another state to obtain relief from the judgment, was defeated again, and again accepted a further payment awarded her by the second judgment, is estopped both by the record in the second case and her acceptance of benefits to maintain another suit in a third state to recover from her former husband support and maintenance for herself and her child, upon the theory that the original judgment of divorce was fraudulently obtained and her acceptance of the money payments was under the duress of extreme necessity. Bidwell v. Bidwell (1905) 139 N. C. 402, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 324, 111 Am. St. Rep. 797, 52 S. E. 55.

A divorced wife who accepted money and property granted her in lieu of dower in a decree of divorce obtained by her husband which she had both time and opportunity to have reviewed on writ of error or appeal, and who afterwards married another man, is estopped from claiming dower in lands of which her former husband was seised during coverture, and which he had conveyed to third persons. Bourne v. Simpson (1849) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 454.

A judgment taken by a wife in a suit to divorce her husband upon the ground of his cruelty to her ought to be set aside and leave granted to the husband to defend, without costs, where, after the suit was begun, the pair became apparently reconciled and lived together as husband and wife upon the wife's agreement to do so, in return for a conveyance of the husband's property, which he made, since the husband had the right to suppose the suit was abandoned. McDonald v. McDonald (1916) — Mich., 157 N. W. 449.

It has, however, been elsewhere held that the acceptance of payments of alimony awarded her by a decree of divorce from her husband does not estop a wife from maintaining an action or proceeding to set aside or modify the decree on the ground that her husband by fraud, undue influence, and duress induced, swayed, and constrained her to sue him for the divorce. Holt v. Holt (1909) 23 Okla. 639, 102 Pac. 187.

In setting aside a judgment annulling a marriage upon a motion made by a wife in whose nominal favor it was rendered, Mr. Justice Borst, of the New York supreme court, anent the proposition that she was estopped to attack it by the acceptance of a large money payment, said in a recent case: It is asserted that plaintiff being the party plaintiff, and having received large monetary consideration in settlement of her rights against defendant, she is now estopped to deny the validity of the judgment. If this is so, then parties may themselves dissolve the marriage contract; for in cases where a judgment, as here, has been obtained against good conscience and without right, the court would not be at liberty to correct it. A party obtaining an invalid decree of divorce or an invalid judgment annulling the marriage is not estopped from calling it in question. Davidson v. Ream (1916) 97 Misc. 89, 161 N. Y. Supp. 73.

A wife fraudulently divorced by her husband has been held in Kansas not to be estopped from attacking the decree by reason of having entered into an agreement with him not to disturb it, in consideration of his paying her a stated sum of money, the greater part of which he never paid. Comstock v. Adams (1880) 23 Kan. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 191.

The reasons for this decision were found in public policy.

But it was held in Colorado that a wife who had been personally served with process in her husband's divorce suit, and who fully comprehended the nature of the proceeding, and refrained from defending, pursuant to a collusive agreement with him, and under his promise to pay her money, could not have the decree he obtained set aside simply because she was cheated out of the promised consideration. Hubbard v. Hubbard (1893) 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170.

In other cases where similar decisions have been made there were additional grounds for denying the cheated spouse relief.

A spouse who voluntarily and knowingly agreed to make no defense to a divorce suit, and collusively consented that a decree be taken in it, in consideration of a promised payment of a sum of money which was never paid, has been held estopped to impeach the decree upon a bill in equity filed five years afterwards, and after the other spouse had married another. Whitley v. Whitley (1908) 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078.

A wronged wife does not furnish a satisfactory and sufficient excuse for a delay of four years in bringing a suit in equity to set aside a decree of divorce fraudulently obtained against her by her husband, who remarried during the interval, by setting up that he assured her when she learned of the decree that she had no remedy, and that if she would forego her purpose to attack it, he would amply and adequately provide pecuniarily for her, and that she believed his assertions and relied upon his promise until he broke his word. Nicholson v. Nicholson (1887) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223.

Every person against whom a decree of divorce has been granted, and who otherwise might have had it set aside for some good cause, becomes effectually estopped successfully to assail its validity as a dissolution of the marriage bond by marrying another spouse. Hekking v. Pfaff (1898) 43 L.R.A. 618, 33 C. C. A. 328, 50 U. S. App. 484, 91 Fed. 60; Arthur v. Israel (1890) 15 Colo. 147, 10 L.R.A. 693, 22 Am. St. Rep. 381, 25 Pac. 81; Scase v. Johnson (1906) 130 Ill. App. 35; Garner v. Garner (1871) 38 Ind. 139; Stephens v. Stephens (1875) 51 Ind. 542; State ex rel. Hahn v. King (1902) 109 La. 161, 33 So. 121.

An appeal from a decree of divorce by an appellant who has married another spouse must be dismissed. Garner v. Garner (1871) 38 Ind. 139; Stephens v. Stephens (1875) 51 Ind. 542.

A man who deserted and left his wife for many years without contributing ought to her support, and who had, though never served with process, actual knowledge that she had brought and was prosecuting a suit for divorce from him, during the pendency of which he wrote the court that he did not care to contest her action, and who, after she had obtained a decree, married another woman, by whom he had issue, and with whom he lived and cohabited as her husband,—is estopped to question the validity of the decree of divorce after the death of the first wife, when nothing but interests in the property of which she died possessed can be affected, notwithstanding the invalidity of the decree, even where it certainly would have been set aside if directly attacked in the lifetime of the wife, and previous to the husband's second marriage. Marvin v. Foster (1895) 61 Minn. 154, 52 Am. St. Rep. 586, 63 N. W. 484.

A woman who, after accepting alimony awarded her in a decree of divorce granted her husband, procured a license, married her paramour, and bore him a child, is estopped from attacking the decree, notwithstanding it may have been void for lack of jurisdiction in the court. Mohler v. Shank (1875) 93 Iowa, 273, 34 L.R.A. 161, 57 Am. St. Rep. 274, 61 N. W. 981.

her first husband had procured a divorce from her in a foreign jurisdiction, and who made no objection to his subsequent marriage to another woman, is estopped from claiming a share in his estate as his lawful widow, even if she might, upon a proper application, seasonably made, have had the divorce set aside. Richardson's Estate (1890) 132 Pa. 292, 19 Atl. 82.

A wife divorced for adultery, and having knowledge of the decree within four days after it was granted, who afterwards conveys property as a feme sole and marries another man, is thereby estopped to set aside, after a lapse of ten years, the decree, on the ground that it was obtained by collusion between her attorney and first husband. Nagle v. Nagle (1910) 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 442.

Conceding a decree of divorce by an act of the legislature to have been unconstitutional and void, nevertheless, where both husband and wife accepted it as valid, and lived separate and apart always afterwards, and each married again another spouse and had issue by the new marriage, a purchaser of real property from the wife twenty years later cannot be heard to object to the title tendered as bad, on the ground that the consent of her first husband had not been given to the conveyance, because the conduct of both estopped each from interfering in any wise in the affairs of the other. Richeson v. Simmons (1870) 47 Mo. 20.

In a case in New York, Brown, J., of the supreme court, decided that a wife divorced by default in a foreign state in which she never had a domicile, without appearing, and upon a service only constructive, was not estopped from claiming dower as widow in her former husband's lands by her marriage to another man and motherhood of his children. Rundle v. Van Inwegan (1886) 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 328. The learned justice deemed the foreign divorce wholly void for want of jurisdiction, and hence incapable of vitalization and validation by any acquiescence of the wife, and he declared that she was an adulteress, that her second marriage was bigamous, and that her children by it were bastards.

XXXIX. Laches in attacking divorces.

The defense of laches is an equitable one, based upon a public policy of discouraging stale claims, for the peace of society. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

Undoubtedly many rights originally founded in fraud become by lapse of time no longer open to inquiry in the usual and ordinary ways. United States v. Throckmorton (1878) 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93.

But, if a decree of divorce appears to be void on the face of the record, delay or inaction of the defeated party will not invest it with any power or vitality, for it is a nullity under all circumstances and for all time. Martin v. Martin (1911) 173 Ala. 106, 55 So. 632.

The general rule is that a bill to impeach a judgment or decree for fraud must be brought within the time allowed for suing out a writ of error. French v. Thomas (1911) 252 Ill. 65, 96 N. E. 564.

Laches in filing a bill in equity to set aside a decree of divorce granted to the complainant in a suit brought in her name is prima facie established by a delay beyond the period fixed by statute for suing out a writ of error. Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581.

In ordinary conditions a plea of laches against a bill in equity will be sustained where the limitation period for analogous actions at law has expired. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

But, notwithstanding an application to open a decree of divorce is made before the time limited by statute for making it has expired, the applicant may, nevertheless, be charged with inexcusable laches in making it. Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017.

An application to set aside a decree of divorce which has been acquiesced in for several years, during which the person who obtained it married again, must be grounded upon something more than spitefulness or a desire to obtain money, or it will be denied. Singer v. Singer (1863) 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 139.

A defense of laches interposed to the suit of a former wife to set aside a decree of divorce obtained by her husband, although it need not be pleaded affirmatively, is not demurrable. Tausick v. Tausick (1909) 52 Wash. 301, 100 Pac. 757.

Unlike the defense of the statute of limitations, that of laches does not entirely rest upon the lapse of time. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

Lapse of time is a factor, and a factor of more and more importance as the time lengthens, in determining whether or not a litigant complaining of a judgment should be denied relief on the ground of laches; but it is never the sole factor. Laches efficient to defeat a suit in equity or other appropriate proceeding to set aside a judgment may not be imputed as a matter of law from the mere lapse of time. Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548; Brown v. Grove (1888) 116 Ind. 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 823, 18 N. E. 387; Leathers v. Stewart (1911) 108 Me. 96, 79 Atl. 16, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 366; Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84; Colby v. Colby (1894) 59 Minn. 432, 50 Am. St. Rep. 420, 61 N. W. 460; Fritz v. Fritz (1899) 9 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 275; Fidelity Ins. Co.'s Appeal (1880) 93 Pa. 242, affirming Peterson v. Peterson (1878) 6 W. N. C. (Pa.) 449; Kellow v. Kellow (1886) 1 Lehigh Valley L. Rep. (Pa.) 202.

"Laches in legal significance is not mere delay, but delay that works a disadvantage to another. So long as parties are in the same condition, it matters little whether one presses a right promptly or slowly, within limits allowed by law; but when, knowing his rights, he takes no step to enforce them until the condition of the other party has, in good faith, become so changed that he cannot be restored to his former state, if the right be then enforced, delay becomes inequitable, and operates as an estoppel against the assertion of the right." Chase v. Chase (1897) 20 R. I. 202, 37 Atl. 804.

This paragraph was quoted and adopted in Leathers v. Stewart (1911) 108 Me. 96, 79 Atl. 16, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 366.

Notwithstanding the time allowed by law for suing out a writ of error may have elapsed before the filing of a bill of review attacking, for fraud in procuring it, a decree of divorce, the bill will not be dismissed when the proof of the fraud is incontrovertible and the delay in bringing suit is fully and satisfactorily explained and excused. Caswell v. Caswell (1887) 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 342, affirming (1886) 24 Ill. App. 548.

Delay beyond the time limited for suing out a writ of error in bringing a bill in equity to impeach a judgment or decree for fraud may be excused and explained when the complainant is either under a disability or ignorant of his rights. French v. Thomas (1911) 252 Ill. 65, 96 N. E. 564.

A delay of a year and seven months by a wife in bringing an action to set aside a decree of divorce obtained against her by fraud by her husband cannot be deemed laches as a matter of law, where her husband sent her to a foreign country and left her without means, in order to prosecute, and prevent her from defending the action. Colby v. Colby (1894) 59 Minn. 432, 50 Am. St. Rep. 420, 61 N. W. 460.

A wife wholly unaware of her rights as a defendant, and ignorant that she had been sued for divorce until long after a decree divorcing her had been obtained by her husband, and who was prevented by his deceit, fraud, and false statements from acquiring knowledge of the suit, is entitled to have the divorce set aside, and to an opportunity to defend on the merits. State ex rel. Weidert v. Superior Ct. (1904) 36 Wash. 81, 78 Pac. 198.

Laches is not imputable to a wife in moving to set aside a judgment fraudulently obtained by her husband upon a wilfully false affidavit to publish the summons, and its publication in a newspaper printed in a foreign language, on purpose to conceal it from her, where she remained wholly ignorant of the decree for two years, and was for a year and a half afterwards in such indigent circumstances that she had not the means to attack the judgment, and only acquired them through menial and domestic service. Everett v. Everett (1884) 60 Wis. 200, 18 N. W. 637.

Although a husband who obtained a decree of divorce from his wife by a gross fraud afterwards married another woman, and notwithstanding the wronged wife delayed several years after she discovered the fraud to take the necessary legal proceedings to have the decree set aside, nevertheless, where the second marriage was contracted before the fraud was discovered, where the second marriage was without issue, and where the second wife was probably a participant in and cognizant of the fraud, there was no laches to bar relief, because the delay did not operate to the disadvantage of the parties. Leathers v. Stewart (1911) 108 Me. 96, 79 Atl. 16, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 366.

That a wife was ill and nearly blind when, without her knowledge or consent, her husband fraudulently instituted a divorce suit and procured a decree of divorce to be entered therein in her name, against himself; that she soon afterwards became totally blind; and was so poor that for most of the subsequent time she was an inmate of the county almshouse, and during all of the time remained actually ignorant of the existence of any decree divorcing her from her husband,—satisfactorily explains and sufficiently excuses a delay L.R.A.1917B.

on her part, even so long as twenty years, in bringing a bill in equity to set aside the decree for fraud in its procurement, against the heirs of her husband, after his death. Brown v. Grove (1888) 116 Ind. 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 823, 18 N. E. 387.

A petition filed within a few months after the enrolment of a decree of divorce, praying that the decree be set aside, cannot be denied on the ground of laches, where, in the interval between the entry of the decree and the presentation of the petition, the status of the spouse who obtained the decree remained unchanged. Galloway v. Galloway (1915) 125 Md. 511, 94 Atl. 97.

A delay of seven months after a decree of divorce has been made absolute, in bringing suit to set it aside on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, cannot be pronounced fatal laches as a matter of law. Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84.

A bill in equity to annul a decree of divorce on the ground of fraud, brought within two years after the decree was granted, and within four months after it came to the complainant's knowledge, cannot be defeated on the ground of laches. Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795.

A delay of two years, even unexplained, in filing an original bill to set aside a divorce obtained by fraud, is not per se such laches as requires a dismissal of the bill, when a statute allows four years in ordinary cases after a fraud is discovered in which to bring an action to avoid what it accomplished. Fritz v. Fritz (1899) 9 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 275.

A decree of divorce founded upon perjury and a substituted service without any actual notice to the defendant may, even after the lapse of eleven years, the delay being satisfactorily explained, be impeached for fraud on motion, and set aside. Adams v. Adams (1872) 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134.

A delay of twelve years constitutes no bar to setting aside in a proper case a judgment of divorce when no subsequent marriage has taken place and no adverse interests of third persons are affected. Fidelity Ins. Co.'s Appeal (1880) 93 Pa. 242, affirming Peterson v. Peterson (1878) 6 W. N. C. 449.

Although several years may have elapsed after a man obtained a divorce from his wife without notice to her and without her knowledge, upon utterly unfounded charges of desertion, predicated upon her occasional absences from home by his consent and approval, the decree will, at her instance, be set aside if no subsequent marriage has taken place and no property rights of third persons are affected. Ibid.

In ordinary circumstances a suit in equity will be sustained against the plea of laches within the limitation period for analogous actions at law. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

Diligence in seeking to set aside a judgment or decree nevertheless is required. A long delay by a person free to act, and not ignorant of the facts, calls for a satisfactory explanation and adequate excuse, and is prima facie laches if these are not forthcoming. McNeil v. McNeil (1909) 95 C. C. A. 485, 170 Fed. 289; Horton v. Stegmyer (Fed.) supra; Hereu v. Hereu (1899) 6 Ariz. 270, 56 Pac. 871; Corney v. Corney (1910) 97 Ark. 117, 133 S. W. 813; Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828; Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581; Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017; *French v. 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761; Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447.

A delay by the widow of a divorced husband who had remarried, until after his death, to bring a suit in equity against his former wife to set aside the decree of divorce, must be adequately excused and explained. Smith v. Smith (1914) 186 Ill. App. 540.

One seeking relief in equity from a judgment may be barred by laches when the delay has been so long and the circumstances have been such as to give rise to a presumption that the right to relief had been relinquished. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

The burden is on a former wife seeking, through a bill in equity, to set aside a decree of divorce granted her former husband without her knowledge, of showing an adequate and satisfactory excuse for a delay of seven years to sue during which the husband married another woman. Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581.

Laches for several years, not explained and excused to the satisfaction of the court by clear, convincing, and preponderating testimony establishing the complainant's alleged ignorance of a divorce suit brought in her name and ending in a decree in her favor, requires a court of equity to dismiss a bill brought by her to set aside the divorce. Ibid.

A decree of divorce assailed on the ground of collusion and fraud between the plaintiff and sheriff to make an official false return of personal service of process on the defendant, after a lapse of eleven years, during which time both the plaintiff and the sheriff died, will not be annulled without the clearest and most convincing proof of the alleged collusion and fraud. Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828.

Long delays without reasonable explanations or adequate excuses for them, where circumstances which render it inequitable to disturb the existing status have arisen in the meantime, have, in sundry cases, proved fatal to promising attempts to set aside decrees of divorce.

Such a result ensued in each of the following cases, after an unexcused delay of—forty years in Douglas v. Teller (1909) 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761, and Givernaud v. Givernaud (1912) 81 N. J. Eq. 66, 85 Atl. 830; —seventeen years in Buffington v. Carty (1905) 195 Mo. 490, 93 S. W. 779; —fifteen years in Hereu v. Hereu (1899) 6 Ariz. 270, 56 Pac. 871, and Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27; —thirteen years in Peyton v. Peyton (1902) 28 Wash. 278, 68 Pac. 757; —twelve years in Holbrook v. Holbrook (1874) 114 Mass. 568; —eleven years in Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828; —ten years in Nagle v. Nagle (1910) 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 442; —nine years in Zoellner v. Zoellner (1881) 46 Mich. 511, 9 N. W. 833; —eight years in Yorston v. Yorston (1880) 32 N. J. Eq. 495; —seven years in Sloan v. Sloan (1882) 102 Ill. 581; and Gans v. Gans (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 309, 76 Atl. 234; —five years in Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134, and Whittley v. Whittley (1908) 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078; —four years in Nicholson v. Nicholson (1889) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223; and Watkinson v. Watkinson (1904) 68 N. J. Eq. 632, 69 L.R.A. 397, 60 Atl. 931, 6 Ann. Cas. 326.

And less lengthy delays of varying duration in McNeil v. McNeil (1909) 95 C. C. A. 485, 170 Fed. 289; Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017; Corney v. Corney (1910) 97 Ark. 117, 133 S. W. 813; Catts v. Catts (1908) 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 293.

An unexplained and unexcused delay for nearly three years to file a bill in equity to set aside a judgment dismissing an action constitutes laches requiring a denial of the prayed-for relief. Treat v. Merchants' Life Assn. (1912) 167 Ill. App. 371.

It cannot be said that the unexcused delays were the absolutely decisive reasons which brought about the defeats of the assailants of the judgments in the foregoing cases; perhaps they were such in few, if any, of them; but in every one of those cases delay without explanation and excuse of weight was a very powerful weapon in repelling the assault.

Laches in seeking it may bar relief from a judgment in equity where the long delay affords reasons in the nature of estoppel which make it unjust or inequitable for the relief to be granted. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086.

The marriage to another of the spouse who obtained a decree of divorce attacked by the divorced mate after a long lapse of time and an unexcused delay is a circumstance strongly tending to render it inequitable to disturb the judgment. Corney v. Corney (1910) 97 Ark. 117, 133 S. W. 813; Whittaker v. Whittaker (1894) 151 Ill. 266, 37 N. E. 1017; Maher v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1900) 95 Ill. App. 365; Earle v. Earle (1883) 91 Ind. 27; Nicholson v. Nicholson L.R.A.1917B.

(1889) 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223; Zoellner v. Zoellner (1881) 46 Mich. 511, 9 N. W. 833.

A decree of divorce in favor of a husband, obtained in a suit of which the wife had full notice and in which she appeared, by collusion between the two, will not, after the lapse of several years and the remarriage of the husband, be disturbed merely to provide the first wife with alimony. Nichols v. Nichols (1874) 25 N. J. Eq. 60.

A delay of fifteen years, during which the plaintiff remarried, after a decree of divorce originally granted on default after service of process by publication had, at the instance of the defendant, and upon her general appearance, been amended so as to secure to her certain property which thereby she obtained, in filing a bill in equity to set aside and annul the decree on the ground that the statute providing for substituted service of process in divorce cases had not been conformed to at the outset of the proceedings, constitutes such inexcusable laches as necessitates a dismissal of the bill. Hereu v. Hereu (1899) 6 Ariz. 270, 56 Pac. 871.

A charge by a wife whose husband obtained a divorce from her on the ground of adultery that he and his agents tampered with and kept away from the trial her witnesses to prove recriminatory charges against him does not warrant the setting aside of the decree after a lapse of a dozen years, where, by the wife's own showing, she knew two or three days before the trial ended of the absence of the witnesses, and took no measures whatever, either to procure their attendance or to obtain a postponement of the trial because of their absence. Holbrook v. Holbrook (1874) 114 Mass. 568.

The application of a wife to set aside a divorce obtained by her husband in a suit of which she had notice and in which she voluntarily and deliberately withdrew her appearance by an attorney, based on allegations that the charges against her were not true and that her husband, by pretending he had abandoned the suit, persuaded her to withdraw her defense, should be denied on the ground of laches where she knew the decree had been granted within a month after it was entered, and, without excuse, delayed for two years to apply for relief, and where the evidence of fraud was very weak and fairly negatived. Catts v. Catts (1908) 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 293.

A wife divorced for adultery who knew about the decree within four days after it had been granted, and who, without adequate excuse or satisfactory explanation, waited ten years before moving to set it aside on the ground of alleged collusion between her attorney and her husband, when the latter had, in the interval, married another woman, who was still living, is barred by laches from relief. Nagle v. Nagle (1910) 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 442.

A delay of more than a year, and until after a new marriage has occurred, by a wife to apply to set aside a divorce obtained by her husband pursuant to her consent and by her collusion, deceitfully procured by his false representations and promises, afterwards broken, and by withholding facts from the court and giving false testimony, amounts to laches fatal to her claim to relief. Karren v. Karren (1902) 25 Utah, 87, 60 L.R.A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815, 69 Pac. 465.

A divorce obtained by a man from his wife by collusion, and with her consent to make no opposition, will not be set aside upon her application, after the lapse of a year, and after the man had married another woman, notwithstanding the consent was obtained upon the man's representation that a divorce was necessary to enable him to get a deed of a homestead, and his promise to remarry his wife after the decree should have been granted. Ibid.

Assuming the judicial power, upon a motion made in the name of a man to set aside a decree of divorce granted to his wife after his answer had been stricken out for his disobedience of an order to pay alimony, to allow his alleged paramour to come in and contradict testimony respecting his adulterous intercourse with her, her laches for several months after she acquired full knowledge of the facts and proceedings would be a sufficient reason for denying relief. Quigley v. Quigley (1887) 45 Hun (N. Y.) 23.

A statute limiting to one year after the person who seeks to vacate a judgment learns of the judgment, the period within which to attack, stands as a bar to a suit to set aside a divorce, brought by the spouse who obtained it, five years after it was granted. Uecker v. Thiedt (1907) 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447.

Relief in an action to set aside a judgment of divorce brought in virtue of the Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7910), for fraud in obtaining it, is barred by laches. Brockman v. Brockman (1916) — Minn. —, 157 N. W. 1086. L.R.A.1917B.

The fact that a woman waited six and a half years before attacking in another suit a decree of divorce obtained by her husband in a suit in which she appeared, and was defeated in such attack, and delayed a considerable time longer to renew her assault upon the decree in another suit, though not deemed controlling, must have influenced the court to defeat her again, as the laches was not excused and hardly was explained. Bidwell v. Bidwell (1905) 139 N. O. 402, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, 111 Am. St. Rep. 797, 52 S. E. 55.

After the lapse of more than forty years and the remarriage and death of a man who had obtained an absolute decree of divorce from his wife, who was living in a foreign country, separate from him, under a limited divorce granted her according to the laws of her domicile, a court of equity will not interfere to set aside the decree upon her uncorroborated testimony that she never had notice of the proceedings and remained ignorant of the decree, for the avowed purpose of collecting a judgment against the deceased's estate, which at law stood barred by the statute of limitations. Givernaud v. Givernaud (1912) 81 N. J. Eq. 66, 85 Atl. 830.

A sufficient excuse for a former wife's delay about forty years to attack a judgment of divorce procured against her by her husband, since deceased, upon a substituted service, is not made by her allegation and oath that she was ignorant until within a few months that any divorce had been granted, when another witness testifies that she talked about the divorce many years before. Douglas v. Teller (1909) 53 Wash. 695, 102 Pac. 761.

A man who had been personally served with process in his wife's suit for divorce, who knew all about it from beginning to end, and refrained from contesting it, and who knowingly and wilfully acquiesced in the status established by the decree obtained by her against him for seventeen years, without seeking to avoid it, during which period the wife gave birth to a child after marrying again, is, after the death of his former wife, regardless of the merits or validity of the decree of divorce, in no position to invoke the aid of a court of equity to nullify the decree to enable him to recover real property held by the wife in her own right, and conveyed by her to an innocent purchaser at its full value, who entered and continued in possession on the faith

An attack on a decree of divorce obtained by a man upon a substituted service and by default, made by the divorced wife thirteen years afterward, on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, where the wife had, in the meantime, commenced proceedings to annul the decree, and had abandoned them pursuant to a money settlement made by her with her former husband; and under advice of counsel, and where she knew for several years that her husband had married and was living with another woman as his wife,—cannot be maintained upon the theory that she did not discover the fraud until within the last six months, since she had the knowledge and means to discover it, and was guilty of laches and want of diligence if she did not do so. Peyton v. Peyton (1902) 28 Wash. 278, 68 Pac. 757.

Acquiescence and laches sufficient to estop in equity from attacking a divorce obtained by a husband against his wife on the ground that he and the sheriff fraudulently conspired falsely to make return of personal service of process in the divorce suit upon her are shown by the production of several letters by her to her former husband, and her acceptance from him of support after the decree was granted, for a period of eleven years, throughout which, according to her own testimony, she had knowledge of the rendition of the decree, and when she did not bring her bill until after the deaths of both her former husband and the sheriff. Barnes v. Willis (1913) 65 Fla. 363, 61 So. 828.

A unexcused delay of eight years by a woman to bring suit to set aside a decree of divorce which her husband had obtained against her, when she knew that, on the faith of it, he had been seven years married to and was living with another woman as his wife, and when, too, during the whole time, she was in constant communication with him and in receipt of regular contributions to her own and her children's support from him, constitutes such an acquiescence on her part as estops her from relief, and is such laches as bars her from relief in a court of equity. Yorston v. Yorston (1880) 32 N. J. Eq. 495.

A decree of divorce fairly and regularly obtained upon default, by a husband, from his wife, while she was living separate from him with her parents, out of the state, and after she had actual notice of the pendency of the suit, and had employed counsel to defend her, who neglected, without any explanation, to file her answer in time, will not be set aside after a delay of seven years, on her application, upon the plea that she was ignorant during the first five of those years that the decree had been rendered, and had been led to believe that the suit had been abandoned, where she offers no excuse or explanation of a further delay of two years after learning the facts, and manifestly seeks only an allowance of alimony. Gans v. Gans (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 309, 76 Atl. 234.

A delay of five years, explained only by a false plea of poverty, is laches which bars relief in equity from a divorce by voluntary default, after a second marriage of the spouse who obtained it. Whitley v. Whitley (1908) 60 Misc. 201, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1078.

That a husband who had obtained a decree of divorce from his wife by fraudulent means repeatedly told her afterwards that he regretted his past misconduct and separation from her, and reiterated a promise to provide for her to the extent of half of his estate, does not sufficiently excuse her for not bringing suit to set aside the decree for five years, having full knowledge of the facts. Horton v. Stegmyer (1910) 99 C. C. A. 332, 175 Fed. 756, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

The record of a decree of divorce nominally in favor of a wife, against her husband, entered in a suit instituted by him in her name, without her knowledge or consent, and of which she was actually ignorant, is not implied notice to her, and cannot be used to impute laches to her in a subsequent suit in equity to annul the decree on the ground of its fraudulent procurement. Brown v. Grove (1888) 116 Ind. 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 823, 18 N. E. 387.

XL. Process, pleadings, procedure, and proof in actions attacking divorces.

a. Constructive service of process in suits to set aside divorces.

In two cases of suits to set aside divorces objections were made at the outset to the jurisdiction of the courts to grant the relief asked, and over the persons of absentee defendants, notwithstanding the decrees attacked had been granted by courts of the same state, or by the court in which the suit was brought. In both there had been no personal service of process on the defendants, and in both the objections were held fatal to the maintenance of the actions.

An action to set aside for fraud in procuring it a decree of divorce, not being one in which by statute service may be made by publication upon an absentee or nonresident defendant, a judgment in such an action, rendered after substituted service by publication and mailing, setting aside a prior divorce, cannot stand. Pullman v. Pullman (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 746.

A court which granted a man a divorce from his nonresident wife upon default, after a substituted service, authorized through his fraud, has no power, thirty years later, to entertain a suit to set it aside, or to grant any relief against it, in a proceeding by the divorced wife, even though she offers an adequate excuse and satisfactory explanation of the delay, where, in the meantime, the man married and had issue by another woman, and died, leaving no estate in the state where he obtained the divorce, but all his property was in another state, in which the second wife and her children resided, so that they could not be personally served with process, and where the only local statute empowering a court to annul its own judgment after the expiration of the term prescribed a time limit of two years. Blair v. Blair (1915) 96 Kan. 757, 153 Pac. 544.

b. Need of specifically pleading ground of attack on divorces.

As a judgment is presumed to be valid, one who would have it set aside on the ground that it was obtained by fraud must, to overbear the presumption, specifically allege and prove the particular acts and conduct that constitute the fraud relied upon to vitiate the judgment. Moss v. Drost (1912) 130 La. 285, 57 So. 929.

A pleading attacking a judgment upon broad, general, and indiscriminate charges of fraud, without any specification of particular facts constituting such fraud, is insufficient. Patrucio v. Selkirk (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 635.

These propositions have abundant support in the decisions. Ramseur v. Bronnell (1889) — Ark. —, 12 S. W. 200; Corney v. Corney (1913) 108 Ark. 415, 159 S. W. 20; McCook v. Bernd Bros. (1887) 79 Ga. 391, 5 S. E. 75; Raburn v. Shortridge (1830) 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 480; Taylor v. Mallory (1892) 76 Md. 1, 23 Atl. 1098; Rooks v. Williams (1858) 13 La. Ann. 374; Devlin v. Boyd (1891) 40 N. Y. S. R. 966, 16 N. Y. Supp. 37; Burnley v. Rice (1858) 21 Tex. 171; L.R.A. 1917B.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henderson (1892) 83 Tex. 70, 18 S. W. 432; Patton v. Taylor (1849) 7 How. (U. S.) 132, 12 L. ed. 637.

A general allegation that the complainant in a suit in equity to set aside a judgment and have a new trial did not have an opportunity to meet the case made by the adversary, without showing why, or any reasonable and proper effort to meet it, frustrated, if made, by fraud and circumvention, is insufficient as a foundation for relief. Moore v. Gulley (1907) 144 N. C. 81, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 242, 56 S. E. 681.

A petition to set aside a judgment is in the nature of a motion for a new trial, and must contain such a statement of facts as would support such a motion, made at the term at which the judgment was rendered. Patrucio v. Selkirk (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 635.

A complaint in an action brought in virtue of the Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 285), to set aside a decree of divorce upon the ground that it was procured by perjured testimony and other fraudulent acts, but which does not specifically point out the alleged frauds and perjuries, nor show that the action was brought within the time limited by the statute for bringing it after discovery of the grounds, is bad on demurrer for failing to state a cause of action. Bomsta v. Johnson (1888) 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341.

A petition alleging that the defendant obtained by fraud a divorce from the petitioner, and praying for "a review of the same that said decree . . . may be annulled," is not open to the objection that it is bad for duplicity, for it seeks only to set aside the decree; and not a retrial of the merits of the divorce suit and annulment of the proceedings at the same time. Lord v. Lord (1877) 66 Me. 265.

c. Defective or objectionable pleadings in suits attacking divorces.

A bill in equity brought by a widow against the first wife of her deceased husband, to set aside a decree of divorce between the two, is properly dismissed for want of equity when it contains neither averments of fraud nor excuses for prima facie laches. Smith v. Smith (1914) 186 Ill. App. 540.

A decree divorcing a husband on the ground that his wife had deserted him will not be annulled as having been fraudulently procured, upon her allegation that she desired and had sought to return to him and his home, supported only by proof that she was not cordially welcomed, without any evidence that she was really prevented or dissuaded from returning by him or with his approval. Miller v. Bearb (1914) 134 La. 893, 64 So. 822.

When, by proceedings regular upon their face, and upon proofs not shown to have been false, an interlocutory decree of divorce has been followed in due course by a final judgment, all upon default, after substituted service by publication, an application to set aside the final judgment under a statute providing for the granting of such relief in such cases, which fails to set out facts required to be stated by such statute, must be denied. Burnes v. Burnes (1895) 61 Mo. App. 612.

An application by a corespondent in a divorce suit to stay the entry of an interlocutory decree until the issues raised by a proposed answer can be tried and determined lacks sufficient support to be granted, in an affidavit of an attorney alone, without the applicant's sworn denial of the charges in the complaint. Stafford v. Stafford (1915) 170 App. Div. 172, 156 N. Y. Supp. 25.

A petition to set aside a decree of divorce, containing averments showing fraud and duress in obtaining it, which, if true, afford sufficient grounds for the relief sought, cannot be struck from the files because, in addition, it contains allegations deemed immaterial, impertinent, and scandalous. Butler v. Butler (1912) 34 Okla. 392, 125 Pac. 1127.

Allegations in proceedings to set aside a divorce that the action had been fraudulently conceived and prosecuted by the plaintiff in conspiracy with a third person named, to obtain a dissolution of the matrimonial bond and possession of some or all of defendant's property, for the mutual benefit of the conspirators, carried through by perjured testimony, are insufficient to make a case for setting aside the decree. Cooper v. Cooper (1916) — Wash. —, 158 Pac. 1007.

Allegations in a suit by a wife to set aside a decree of divorce granted her husband in proceedings of which she had due notice, instituted in her home county, that she was prevented from defending and appearing at the trial by his promises, upon which she relied, that if she would absent herself, he would withdraw the charges of adultery he had made and rely upon other grounds, would L.R.A.1917B.

not ask to have the custody of their minor child, but would leave it in care of her mother, and would deed her her interest in land they owned, and give her a part of his personal property,—do not, in legal contemplation, constitute a fraud in obtaining the decree, especially when not coupled with any charge that the promises were made of purpose to cheat and deceive the wife, and with an intent to break them. Sperry v. Sperry (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 419.

The petition of an injured spouse to set aside a decree of divorce upon the ground that it was procured by a fraud is not demurrable because it fails to allege that the other spouse has not married again. Rush v. Rush (1877) 46 Iowa, 648, 26 Am. Rep. 179, rehearing denied in (1878) 48 Iowa, 701.

A reviewing court is not warranted in upsetting a judgment vacating a decree for fraud in procuring it, upon the ground that the petition assailing such decree contained naught but very general and indefinite allegations of fraud, when such allegations were broad enough to justify the reception of evidence of fraud, and no objection to the admission of such evidence was made, based upon the generality and indefiniteness of the charges. Frisbie v. Chase (1913) 161 Iowa, 133, 140 N. W. 842.

Upon the overruling of a demurrer to a complaint in an action to annul a decree of divorce upon the ground that it was obtained by a fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court and the complainant, no judgment can be rendered pro confesso, but clear proof of the alleged fraud is still required. Lord v. Lord (1877) 66 Me. 265.

A judgment vacating a decree of divorce which was granted by default upon a constructive service by publication, giving the complainant leave to appear and defend the divorce suit, on the ground that a fraud was perpetrated by a false affidavit to procure the substituted service, will not be disturbed on appeal for error in admitting testimony to support the attack on the divorce, where a meritorious defense to the divorce suit plainly exists, and the defendant had neither waived legal service of process nor appeared. Parramore v. Parramore (1911) 61 Fla. 701, 55 So. 795.

The principle of the common law, even when embodied in a statute which prohibits private conversations of husband and wife to be testified to by either, does not prevent either from testifying that such a conversation took place at a stated time and place, and what was done as a result of it, for the purpose of proving inferentially a fraudulent misrepresentation vitiating a decree of divorce attacked for fraud. Sampson v. Sampson (1916) 223 Mass. 451, 112 N. E. 84.

XXI. Effect of vacating decree of divorce.

A decree of divorce granted after an ex parte hearing where service was made by publication only, set aside by order giving the defendant leave to answer and contest upon the merits, becomes a nullity when the plaintiff omits to appeal from the order and voluntarily dismisses the suit for the purpose of bringing a new action in another county. Cheyney v. Cheyney (1910) 163 Mich. 598, 128 N. W. 780.

Annulling a decree of divorce for fraud in procuring it restores the matrimonial status as it was before the decree was made. Voorhees v. Voorhees (1890) 46 N. J. Eq. 411, 19 Am. St. Rep. 404, 19 Atl. 172, affirmed in (1890) 47 N. J. Eq. 315, 14 L.R.A. 366, 20 Atl. 676; State v. Watson (1898) 20 R. I. 354, 78 Am. St. Rep. 871, 39 Atl. 193, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 24, affirmed in (1900) 179 U. S. 679, 45 L. ed. 383, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 915.

The pendency undetermined of a suit in equity to annul a decree of divorce granted by default, on service by publication, cannot impair the force of the decree in the slightest. Re McNeil (1909) 155 Cal. 333, 100 Pac. 1086.

XXII. Conclusion.

Any attempt to formulate a conclusion which should be a safe foundation for forecasting the outcome of a given attack upon a divorce is foredoomed to failure. It is not alone because, as was said in one case, the methods of procedure to vacate and annul judgments after the expiration of the terms at which they were rendered vary greatly in the different jurisdictions (Tyler v. Aspinwall (1901) 73 Conn. 493, 54 L.R.A. 758, 47 Atl. 755), but it is literally the case, as was said in another, that every suit in equity to annul a decree of divorce must necessarily be determined by its own peculiar facts and circumstances (Maher L.R.A. 1917B).

In addition to the difficulties made apparent by these citations, there is to be considered the powerful element of judicial discretion to grant relief,—an element of influence varying in strength virtually with every judge, according to his predilection to make as far as possible a marriage indissoluble, or a dissolution of it irreversible. When account is further taken of the supposed public policy of the state where the divorce is attacked, and its legislation upon the subject, expressed in the statutes or construed by the courts, the search for a reliable guide even in a single jurisdiction becomes hopeless. The setting aside of a divorce always involves questions of fact determined, as the proceeding or suit is equitable, by the court itself, and none can say what evidence of the basic facts will be regarded as sufficiently clear and satisfactory to convince the trial judge of the justice and propriety of granting the relief sought; nor, if the facts shall be indubitably proved, can anyone say if the excuses for not making an earlier attack on the decree will be judicially deemed adequate, nor whether, the facts being established and the excuses considered valid, the court will not, after all, consider it inequitable or contrary to public policy to grant any relief. In the past many divorces granted without actual notice or real chance to defend have been held absolutely final on technical grounds, even when founded in fraud and perjury. In the past many successful raiders upon domestic peace have been judicially pronounced innocent third persons with equities superior to those of cruelly injured spouses, and by judicial adjudication have secured the fruits of the raids. It is too much to expect that such wrongs will not be repeated, yet there may be discerned a growing tendency in the courts not to repeat them, and it may be said with some confidence that efforts to get relief from iniquitous decrees of divorce which would certainly have failed in times gone by are in future likely to succeed. The cases in point have been collated with care and presented in such detail that it is believed that the future assailant of a wrongful divorce may be able to keep the difficult and devious path to the goal of nullification when it is attainable at all.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MRS. M. E. HOWLAND, Plff. in Err.,
v.

R. L. MORRIS et al.

Mortgage — foreclosure — sale of entire tract.

1. An execution issued upon a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage on land, which is described in the mortgage, judgment, and execution as one entire tract, may be levied on the entire tract, and the levy will not be excessive, although the value of the land may be much greater than the amount sufficient to satisfy the execution. Nor will a sheriff's sale of the entire tract, made in pursuance of such a levy, be void merely because the tract was capable of subdivision so that, by sale of a less quantity than the whole, a sum would be realized sufficient to discharge the fi. fa.

For other cases see Mortgage, VI. g, §, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — consideration — sufficiency.

2. Under the facts of this case, the sheriff's sale was not void, either because of inadequacy of consideration, or for the reason that a valid affidavit of illegality by the defendant in fi. fa. was delivered to the sheriff prior to the sale.

For other cases, see Mortgage, VI. g, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(May 19, 1914.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Floyd County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed for the cancellation and rescission of a sheriff's sale of property under a mortgage foreclosure. Affirmed.

Statement by Fish, Ch. J.:

Mrs. Medora E. Howland gave the Exchange Bank of Rome two mortgages on a parcel of land situated in the city of Rome and known as the "Toll house and lot," described by metes and bounds, to secure, respectively, two debts owing by her to the bank, one for $1,000 principal and interest, and the other for $500 principal and interest. Both mortgages were duly foreclosed and executions issued thereon in which the property ordered to be sold was described in the same way as set forth in the mortgages. The execution for $1,000 principal and $88.55 interest, together with cost, was levied on the mortgaged property, which was described in the entry of levy in the same manner as in the mortgage and the execution; and it was advertised for sale as one parcel of land with the same description contained in the mortgage execution and levy. An attorney at law for the mortgagor prepared what purported to be an affidavit of illegality, in order to stop the sale of the property under the mortgage execution, on the grounds (a) that the mortgagor had never been served with a copy of the petition and rule nisi in the foreclosure proceeding, that she did not appear and plead therein nor waive service in any way, that she was not within the jurisdiction of the court at the time the entry of service was made, and had no knowledge of the proceeding until after the levy; and (b) that the return of service by the deputy sheriff, to the effect that he had served her personally with a copy of the foreclosure proceeding on a given date, was untrue, and that she traversed such return as entered. This affidavit began as follows: "Georgia, Floyd county: In person before me came the defendant in the above-stated case, who, being duly sworn, says under oath," etc. And it concluded with these words: "Sworn to and subscribed before me, October 1, 1912. Mrs. M. E. Howland. Witness. A. S. West. N. P. Floyd Co., Ga." This paper was handed, on the afternoon prior to the day of sale, by the attorney for the mortgagor to a lady who was alleged to have charge of the affairs in the office of the sheriff of Floyd county, with the statement by the attorney to her, "Here is an affidavit of illegality to stop the sale of the Howland property." The paper was delivered to the sheriff by the lady referred to some time prior to the sale of the property. On the day the sale was advertised to take place, the sheriff "called up the attorney of plaintiff in fi. fa., and they together called over the telephone A. S. West, who had witnessed the said signature of Mrs. M. E. Howland as aforesaid, and . . . West said to them that he had merely witnessed the paper, and that it was not sworn to before him." Neither the sheriff nor the attorney for the plaintiff in fi. fa. notified the mortgagor or her attorney that they had received this information from West, or "that they would sell said property, or that they would not recognize the validity of said affidavit of illegality, or the legal sufficiency thereof." The property was sold as advertised by the sheriff, and brought the sum of $1,910, R. L. Morris being the purchaser, and the sheriff conveyed the property to him in pursuance of the sale. Subsequently the mortgagor brought an equitable petition against Morris and the sheriff, in which she alleged in substance the foregoing facts, and further:

"That said property levied on was and is of the value of $8,000, that the same is composed of a number of separate and distinct lots, and that the same can be easily divided into four lots worth approximately $2,000 each." Also, "that said affidavit of illegality was properly witnessed and properly executed, and that when same was filed by your petitioner's attorney that both she and her attorney never questioned the fact but that it would stop the sale of said property, and for this reason failed to appear at the sale of said property or to be there, and as a result of their absence said property was sold at a grossly inadequate price, to wit, the sum of $1,910, to R. L. Morris of Rome, Georgia." And that "petitioner says that said action of the attorney for plaintiff in fi. fa., and said sheriff, in calling up said witness A. S. West and in keeping their information, and their further action in failing and refusing to notify either your petitioner or her counsel that said affidavit of illegality would not be accepted, and that said sale would be held on said first Tuesday in October, amounted to fraud. Petitioner further shows that said levy was grossly excessive, and that a levy on one of the lots constituting said property described in said mortgage and levied on as aforesaid would have been sufficient to have brought the amount of said mortgage fi. fa.; that said property was made up of four separate and distinct lots, either one of which was worth more than the sum of said mortgage fi. fa., principal, interest, and cost; and that said levy on said property to satisfy said mortgage fi. fa. was grossly excessive and amounted to fraud. Petitioner shows that on account of said fraud, misrepresentation, irregularity, error, omission, and misapprehension of your petitioner and her attorney as to the time of sale, the said excessive levy as aforesaid, and the grossly inadequate price for which said property was bid in as aforesaid, constitutes such fraud and that said deed [from the sheriff to Morris] should be set aside."

The prayer in the petition as amended was as follows: "Wherefore petitioner prays that said deed be canceled of record, and said sale be set aside and declared null, void, and of no effect, and that petitioner be placed in full possession of said premises."

Process was prayed against Morris and the sheriff. Each of the defendants demurred to the petition. The demurrers were sustained, and the petitioner excepted.

Messrs. Maddox & Doyal and Harris & Harris for defendants in error.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In their brief filed in this court counsel for plaintiff in error say: "The petition alleged, as ground for setting aside this deed and sale, (1) that the levy was excessive; (2) that the price was grossly inadequate; and (3) that the defendant in fi. fa., before the sale of said property, filed with the sheriff's office an affidavit of illegality which was accepted by the sheriff's office, and thereupon the defendant in fi. fa. naturally supposing that the said sale would be postponed until a hearing could be had upon this affidavit, went away from the place of sale, and that later the attorney for the Exchange Bank, without the knowledge of Mrs. Howland or her attorney, conferred with the sheriff, and they thereupon made certain private investigations, and finally set aside the affidavit of illegality and sold the property without notifying or attempting to notify either Mrs. Howland or her attorney."

We will deal with the points insisted on in the brief in the order there stated.

1. Was the levy excessive? Counsel contend in their brief that the mortgaged property was susceptible of subdivision, so as to sell a less quantity than the whole, and thereby raise a sum sufficient to satisfy the mortgage fi. fa.; and therefore that the sale of the entire property was not lawful and should be set aside. We will consider these two points in this division of the opinion. In Vickers v. Hawkins, 111 Ga. 119, 120, 36 S. E. 464, it was said: "That an execution in rem against certain specific property may properly be levied upon that property, and that the levy will not be void for excessiveness though the value of the property be far greater than the amount of the execution. We therefore think that, where a tax execution is issued against a particular lot of land, commanding the levying officer to levy upon and sell that lot, a levy of the execution upon the entire lot is not excessive."

This ruling was followed in Wilkinson v. Holton, 119 Ga. 557 (3), 558, 46 S. E. 620, where a security deed had been given by the debtor to his creditor and judgment obtained for the indebtedness, and an execution issued thereon had been levied on the entire land conveyed in the deed. In the case last cited it was said that, "Where the property is easily susceptible of division, it would be the duty of the sheriff to expose it for sale in parcels, in such a way as to discharge the amount due on the executions with as little loss to the plaintiff in the present action as possible."

It will, however, clearly appear from an examination of that case that what was said in respect of the sale, in parcels, of property levied on under the execution there involved, where it is susceptible of subdivision, was purely obiter. See also Cooney v. Atlanta, 136 Ga. 118 (3), 120, 70 S. E. 950, where the fi. fa. apparently directed the marshal to sell so much of the property described as might be necessary to make the amount of an assessment for a local improvement, and the marshal, in his answer to a petition for injunction, disclaimed any intention to sell in bulk rather than in parcels. Without discussing what may be the rule in cases of executions in rem for taxes or for assessments for local improvements, we know of no case, where the question was in issue, holding that where a mortgage execution has been levied on the entire property described in the mortgage judgment of foreclosure, and execution, it must be sold in parcels when susceptible of subdivision. In the other cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, the executions there involved were not against specific property, but were against the defendants generally. In Reeves v. Bolles, 95 Ga. 402, 22 S. E. 626, a borrower of money secured the same by a deed to a large tract of land to the lender, judgment was obtained for the money loaned, and execution was levied upon the entire tract of land. The defendant in fi. fa., and certain persons as his judgment creditors, filed an equitable petition to enjoin the sale, and prayed that the land be surveyed, platted, and sold in separate parcels. The petitioners alleged that, if the land should be sold in one entire tract, it would bring a much less sum than if the same were sold in parcels, and would therefore be sacrificed unless the defendants were enjoined from making the sale as advertised; that is, to be sold in gross. The trial judge refused to grant the injunction, and upon a writ of error to this court his judgment was affirmed. There was a conflict in the evidence submitted, as to whether or not the land would sell to better advantage if divided up into parcels than it would if sold as one entire tract. In the opinion, pronounced by Mr. Justice Samuel Lumpkin in behalf of the court, it was said: "This [conflict in the evidence] of itself would be a sufficient reason for declining to interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing by injunction to arrest the progress of the defendant's execution."

The decision, however, was not left to stand on this ground alone, for it was said: "Granting, however, for the sake of the argument, that a larger amount would be realized by selling the plaintiff's land in separate tracts, we are still of the opinion that the judge was right in denying the injunction. It may be within the power of the court of equity, in some cases, to decree that the property of a debtor shall be sold in parcels, and not as a whole, where it manifestly appears that gross injustice would result if the latter course were pursued. We are entirely satisfied, however, that the case in hand is not one of this kind. The plaintiff, Reeves, borrowed money, gave his note for the same, and for the purpose of securing its repayment executed a deed conveying the entire body of land now in controversy. This gave to the lender an absolute legal right to enforce the collection of any judgment he might obtain upon the note by a sale of the land as one entire tract. . . . The land in its entirety being specifically pledged for the payment of the debt, it must inevitably have been within the contemplation of the parties that, if it should become necessary to enforce payment by resort to legal proceedings, the land would be subject to sale as a whole just as it was conveyed. It is not denied that the plaintiff in execution has a perfect legal right to have all the land sold to satisfy his judgment; and to have granted the injunction sought would necessarily have been to interfere, to some extent, with the exercise of this right."

A judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage on realty is in the nature of a judgment in rem: "It is a judgment to enforce a specific lien, created by agreement of the parties. It is not alone a judgment as to the amount due on the mortgage, but it is also a judgment that the property mortgaged shall be sold to pay the sum adjudged to be due. . . . In pursuance of the judgment, the process issues, commanding the officer to levy upon and sell the property, naming it specifically. . . . What right of judgment or discretion has he? His duty is to levy the process, and the process commands him to levy upon and sell the property, designating it by full description. He is not directed to raise money, as in case of a general judgment, out of the property of the defendant, but to raise it out of the property named." Wallace v. Holly, 13 Ga. 389, 393, 394, 58 Am. Dec. 518.

That it is not the duty of an officer making a sale of land in pursuance of a mortgage foreclosure to divide the land into parcels in making the sale, where the land is described in the mortgage and judgment of foreclosure as a single tract, see Patton v. Smith, 113 Ill. 499; Shannon v. Hay, 106 Ind. 589, 7 N. E. 376; Geuda Springs Town & Water Co. v. Lombard, 57 Kan. 625, 47 Pac. 532; Cochran v. Goodell, 131 Mass. 464.

In the case at bar the property, as appears from the petition, was described in the mortgage, the judgment of foreclosure, the execution, the entry of levy, and the sheriff's advertisement of sale, as "all that tract or parcel of land situated, lying, and being in a part of the strip of land lying on the south bank of the Etowah river in the fifth ward of the city of Rome, Floyd county, Georgia, known as the 'Toll house and lot;'" the tract being further described by boundaries and distances. We are clear from what has been said that the levy was not excessive nor the sale void because the property was not subdivided and sold in parcels.

2. We are equally convinced that the sale was not void on account of inadequacy of price. Inadequacy of consideration, even if it be gross, is not per se sufficient cause to set aside a sheriff's sale, though it may be a strong circumstance to show fraud. Parker v. Glenn, 72 Ga. 637; Civ. Code, § 4129.

"While inadequacy of price at a sheriff's sale will not, of itself, be a sufficient ground to set aside the sale, yet when it is grossly inadequate and is connected with fraud, mistake, misapprehension, surprise, or other circumstances which tend to bring about such inadequacy, to the injury of parties interested, the sale will be set aside by a court of equity." Smith v. Georgia Loan & T. Co. 114 Ga. 189, 39 S. E. 846.

If the price were grossly inadequate in the present case, there were no circumstances connecting it with any fraud, mistake, misapprehension, or surprise, bringing about such inadequacy, as to authorize the setting aside of the sale. As already shown, the levy upon and the sale of the entire tract were lawful, and, as will later be made to appear, the other circumstances relied upon to indicate fraud were not sufficient for that purpose.

"This court, in Brooks v. Rooney, 11 Ga. 427, 56 Am. Dec. 430, adopts the rule in Wheaton v. Sexton, 4 Wheat. 503, 4 L. ed. 626, and makes the purchaser bound to look to the judgment, the levy, and deed, and at sheriff's sales requiring him to notice only these. Caveat emptor is not to be applied to him in any other conduct of the officer or other authority to sell and convey." Overby v. Hart, 68 Ga. 493, 496; Parker v. Glenn, 72 Ga. 637 (2a).

In Wilson v. Boyd, 84 Ga. 34, 10 S. E. 499, it was said that, if the sheriff sold lawfully, it could not be a fraud for the purchaser to buy, although he paid a small price. "If he was the highest and best bidder at a fair and lawful sale, he was entitled to the benefit of his purchase, no matter how little it cost him."

In Boyd v. Wilson, 86 Ga. 379, 12 S. E. 744, 13 S. E. 428, it was held: "A purchaser at a tax sale duly made under a legal levy, who is neither implicated in nor aware of any fraud contemplated by the selling officer, is not affected thereby."

In the instant case there was nothing tending to show that Morris, the purchaser of the property at the sheriff's sale, had any knowledge or notice of any irregularity or fault on the part of the sheriff or the plaintiff in execution (the bank) or its attorney, even if anything of that character existed.

3. Was the sale void for the reason that the sheriff made it after the paper purporting to be an affidavit of illegality had come into his hands? We have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that it was not. An affidavit of illegality must, of course, be sworn to; otherwise it would not be an affidavit. Civ. Code, § 5305. The paper purporting to be an affidavit of illegality, which was lodged in the sheriff's office the afternoon prior to the sheriff's sale of the property, was unusual in form. In the beginning it stated: "In person before me came the defendant in the above-stated case, who, being duly sworn, says under oath," etc. But the jurat, while in the ordinary form, was followed by the word "witness," under which was the name of a notary public. Mrs. Howland's name was signed to the paper. The word "witness" following the jurat probably attracted the attention of the sheriff and caused him and the attorney for the plaintiff in fi. fa. to call up the notary, who apparently had merely witnessed the paper, and to inquire of him whether he had administered an oath to the defendant in fi. fa. The notary replied no, that he had merely witnessed the defendant's signature. This all appears from the petition, in which it was nowhere alleged clearly and expressly that the defendant had sworn to the purported affidavit of illegality. It is true the petition alleged "that said affidavit of illegality was properly witnessed and property executed," but the allegation that it was properly executed partakes more of the nature of a conclusion of the pleader than an unequivocal statement of a fact. Such equivocal allegation was allowed to stand by the pleader in the face of a special demurrer that the petition did not allege that Mrs. Howland "ever made oath to said alleged affidavit of illegality." Certainly it was within the knowledge of Mrs. Howland and her attorney whether she had made oath as to the truth of the contents of the paper. It did not appear from the petition that the sheriff ever accepted the paper as an affidavit of illegality, nor did he do or say anything which tended to induce Mrs. Howland or her attorney to believe that he would accept it. Her attorney, on the afternoon before the day of sale, merely handed the paper to the lady who was alleged to have charge of the affairs of the sheriff in his office, with the statement, "Here is an affidavit of illegality to stop the sale of the Howland property," and this was followed by the allegation that the lady turned the paper over to the sheriff some time prior to the sale. Ordinary diligence, we think, required Mrs. Howland or her attorney to ascertain from the sheriff whether he would accept the paper as an affidavit of illegality and stop the sale. So far as the petition shows, neither of them communicated with the sheriff in reference to the matter, nor was either of them present during sale hours to see whether or not the sale would be made. Moreover, there was no hint in the petition that Morris, the purchaser at the sale, had any knowledge or notice in reference to the paper purporting to be an affidavit of illegality.

In view of all these circumstances, we have no hesitancy in holding that the sale should not be declared void, and that there was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Amount of property to be sold under mortgage foreclosure.

It is the purpose of the present annotation to treat the general question of the amount of property to be sold under a mortgage foreclosed either by suit in equity or action under a statute as well as by the exercise of a power of sale, also to include the question of the mode or manner of sale, that is, as to whether the mortgaged property shall be sold in lots or parcels or in entirety, solido, block, bulk, or lump, as well as the question of the avoidability of a sale claimed to have been made in an irregular mode or in a wrong amount. The treatment, however, is confined to controversies between the mortgagor and the mortgagee or persons succeeding fully to their rights, in which the fact that rights of third persons may be involved does not influence the decisions. This limitation excludes cases turning upon the fact that there have been conveyances of parts of the premises subject to the mortgage as well as those in which there were successive mortgages or mortgages to different parties.<sup>1</sup> Cases which involve the amount and mode of sale as affected by the fact that dower rights are involved or that a homestead comprises a part of the mortgaged premises are likewise excluded.

Cases involving foreclosure of deeds of trust which are in the nature of a mortgage are included herein.

Foreclosure by action or suit.

Included under this heading are the cases involving foreclosure of a mortgage by an action or suit, the procedure in which was not controlled by statute. In other words, the present subdivision is reserved for treatment of those cases wherein neither the amount of the property to be sold nor the mode of sale was determined either by a power of sale<sup>2</sup> or by statutory provision<sup>3</sup> relating or applicable to foreclosure of a mortgage or deed of trust.

Taking up this phase of the general

land separately mortgaged, separately, see note to Bechtel v. Weir, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 549.

question under annotation, it may be said that the general rule is that a court of equity in decreeing foreclosure of a mortgage may, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it in such cases, properly direct that the mortgaged property be sold in such order or mode as would be for the best interests of the parties to the action.<sup>4</sup> In fact, as has well been said, it is a settled and familiar principle with the courts that the mortgaged property shall be so disposed of as to bring the best price possible consistent with the preservation of the rights of the mortgagee,<sup>5</sup> and that courts of equity, in case of mortgage sales, will control and regulate the proceedings so that no injustice shall be done to either party.<sup>6</sup>

And generally speaking there are no arbitrary and inflexible rules requiring the adoption of a particular mode, as, for instance, that property be offered and sold in legal subdivisions or in any particular parcels or quantities, but rather each case must depend upon its own particular facts,<sup>7</sup> the usual and proper practice in the absence of special circumstances being to direct the sale of the mortgaged premises, or as much thereof as is necessary to satisfy the decree if a part can be sold with the least injury to the defendants.<sup>8</sup> Of course, while the courts must not cut off any absolute rights of an interested party,<sup>9</sup>

it may give, where it feels called upon to do so, specific direction as to the mode and amount of mortgaged property to be sold,<sup>10</sup> and it is the absolute duty of the officer making the sale to follow the decree and order of sale in such a case,<sup>11</sup> even though the judgment debtor demand that a different mode be adopted,<sup>12</sup> the officer having no discretion in the matter where an explicit direction is given by the court;<sup>13</sup> or it may decree that the property be sold in the manner prescribed for the sale of real estate under execution,<sup>14</sup> or it may decree a sale in such parcels as the officer may think will secure the best price.<sup>15</sup> And ordinarily a decree of foreclosure may be wholly silent as to the order in which the mortgage premises shall be offered for sale.<sup>16</sup> However, an application to the court by the debtor, that the decree of foreclosure direct in the alternative the sale of the mortgaged premises or so much as may be necessary, if a part may be sold separately without injury to the parties, should be respected where the court itself does not direct the specific mode or manner of sale to be pursued.<sup>17</sup> And even though the property mortgaged consists of separate parcels, or can readily be cut up into parcels, equity may and ought to order all the property to be sold together where to sever the same would decrease the value of each parcel.<sup>18</sup> And it has been held that it is error for the court, in decreeing foreclosure of a mortgage, to leave it optional with the master to sell a part or the whole of the property at his discretion, where any of the defendants are infants,<sup>19</sup> or are non compos mentis, or under any other legal disability which would prevent them from appearing and protecting their rights.<sup>20</sup> However, the courts which so hold also admit that there are cases in which a discretion may be confided in the master in regard to the sale.<sup>21</sup> And in such jurisdiction it has also been held that it is not error to decree a sale without first ascertaining whether the amount due might be raised by a sale of a part of the mortgaged premises, where the defendants are all adults,<sup>22</sup> unless it be suggested that such a reference is proper, as where the mortgaged premises exceed in value the amount of the mortgage debt and are capable of subdivision and a motion is made for a reference.<sup>23</sup>

Where no direction in relation to the order or mode of sale is contained in the decree, the officer charged with its execution is vested with discretionary power.<sup>24</sup> And the same conclusion has been reached where the mortgaged premises consisted of one undivided tract, it being held that the officer making the sale still had discretionary power to sell the whole or part of the premises even though the writ commanded him to sell "so much" of the premises as might be necessary to satisfy the mortgage debt.<sup>25</sup> But the discretionary power vested in an officer whose duty it is to make a sale is subject to the control of the court,<sup>26</sup> and the court may, upon directing a sale of mortgaged property or so much thereof as is necessary, also direct that, in case the officer employed to make the sale is in doubt as to whether justice requires a sale of the whole or a part only of the premises, he shall report the facts, etc., for direction.<sup>27</sup>

Where a discretion is vested in the trustee or other officer empowered to sell as a whole or in parcels, it must be exercised in good faith for the best interests of both the creditor and debtor;<sup>28</sup> in other words, it is his duty to sell in the mode which, in the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion, probably will be the most advantageous.<sup>29</sup> Or, as it has been stated, it is the duty of an officer when making the sale, if not controlled by express direction or other rule of law, to sell the property in the manner he thinks best calculated to produce competition, so that it will bring the most money and that no more property a manufacturing plant was located would produce a less price if cut up than if sold as an entirety).

may be sold than is necessary to satisfy the debt and costs.<sup>30</sup>

And some general rules for the guidance of an officer having discretionary power as to the amount of property to be sold under mortgage foreclosure and the mode of selling the same are deducible from the cases. Thus the general rule is that mortgaged property which consists of several distinct known lots, parcels, or tracts shall be first offered for sale in parcels,<sup>31</sup> especially where the debtor requests that such a mode of sale be adopted,<sup>32</sup> or the decree directs the sale of land or so much thereof as is necessary to pay the debt,<sup>33</sup> the theory being that many persons might be disposed to bid for separate parcels of the mortgaged property who have neither the wish nor the means to acquire the whole property, and that sales en masse therefore tend to the sacrifice of the property of the debtor and his consequent prejudice.<sup>34</sup> But this rule, while a wholesome one, is not an arbitrary one, and should not be enforced where there is a valid reason for a sale of property en masse; as, for example, where the latter mode will insure the best prices and be most advantageous to all parties concerned,<sup>35</sup>

Y.) 403, holding that the sale en masse, in the discretion of the officer, of contiguous and adjacent mortgaged premises which had always been controlled by one person, or where the separate parcels are used as one property and all are essential to such use.<sup>36</sup> And no objection can be raised to the sale of mortgaged lands en masse where they consist of contiguous subdivisions or distinct tracts, if they are first offered in separate parcels and no bids are received.<sup>37</sup> In fact, where the mortgaged property consists of distinct tracts or parcels, and upon the offering of the same for sale parcel by parcel either no bids are received, or the bids received are insufficient to cover the mortgage debt, the officer is in duty bound to offer the property for sale en masse.<sup>38</sup>

And where the mortgaged property is readily divisible, the officer making the sale may divide the property and offer the same by parcels, if that mode of sale seems more advisable to him and he has discretionary power to determine the mode of sale.<sup>39</sup> In fact, where the property is divisible and an offer sufficient to satisfy all claims is made for a designated part of the property, it would seem to be the duty of the officer to so divide and sell such part only.<sup>40</sup> But where the land is mortgaged as an entirety and the decree for sale follows the description used in the mortgage, it has been held that the officer making the sale is not bound to take upon himself the duty of dividing the mortgaged premises, there being no directions in the decree or requests by the parties.<sup>41</sup>

And in England and Canada it has been held that, even though land may be divided vertically and parcels of it sold, it cannot be divided horizontally; that is, mines, timber, fixtures, etc., cannot be separated from the land itself.<sup>42</sup> But in England legislation finally provided for the severance of timber and mines from the land with the sanction of the court.<sup>43</sup>

And, generally, where the mortgaged property is divided or is divisible, only so much of it should be sold as will satisfy the mortgage debt.<sup>44</sup> Nor, from the fact that the decree authorizes all the mortgaged premises to be sold, does it would not be disturbed; Miller v. Trudgeon (1905) 16 Okla. 337, 86 Pac. 523, 8 Ann. Cas. 730, holding that a sale en masse of land which had been platted into lots was proper.

follow that all should be sold where the mortgage covers separate and distinct tracts of land, in such a case it being the duty of the officer making the sale to offer each tract separately, and when the sales amount to sufficient to pay the debt and costs to desist from any further sale.<sup>45</sup>

Of course, the parties to a mortgage may in terms prescribe whether the property is to be sold en masse or in separate parcels,<sup>46</sup> and if in parcels may state the order in which the same are to be disposed of;<sup>47</sup> and an agreement to this end is enforceable.<sup>48</sup> But it has been held that where such a mortgage is foreclosed in equity the court is not bound to decree a sale in strict accordance with the terms prescribed in the mortgage, but may exercise a sound discretion, having due regard to the interests of all the parties.<sup>49</sup> And where the mortgage expressly provides the mode in which the premises shall be sold, such provisions may be waived by the parties so as to preclude insistence that the same be complied with.<sup>50</sup>

And some question has also been made as to whether or not either the debtor or the creditor may control the discretion of the officer having a foreclosure sale in charge, by a request or direction that a particular mode of sale be adopted or that certain parcels only of the mortgaged property be sold. In this respect it seems that generally the debtor may govern the mode of sale by requesting or directing that the mortgaged property be sold in a certain mode or order,<sup>51</sup> unless a sale in the mode requested would not be so advantageous as another,<sup>52</sup> or would violate an absolute right of the mortgagee,<sup>53</sup> or unless the premises were mortgaged as one tract and subsequently divided, and the subdivision was not accepted by the mortgagee,<sup>54</sup> or unless there is a difference of opinion between the debtor and creditor as to how the mortgaged premises should be sold,<sup>55</sup> in which case it has been held that the matter is discretionary with the officer making the sale. In fact, it has been held that under a decree for a sale of land, or a competent part thereof, where it will not be necessary to sell the whole property, it is the duty of the mortgagor to protect himself against the sale of an excess quantity by parceling out the amount to be sold.<sup>56</sup> And obviously, where the mortgaged premises are worth far more than the debt and costs, and are laid out in lots, the court may decree that the debtor be allowed to direct what portion of the premises shall be first sold.<sup>57</sup>

And the instructions or wishes of the owner should control over those of the creditor where a sale in the mode desired by the former will satisfy the creditor's claim in full.<sup>58</sup> The parties may, however, by stipulation, agree as to who shall determine the mode and order of sale;<sup>59</sup> but this statement does not apply where all the debtors are not parties to the agreement, it having been held that the complainant and one of several defendants interested in the subject matter cannot stipulate a mode or order of sale different from that prescribed by the court.<sup>60</sup>

Where only a part of the mortgage debt is due, the general rule is that the court should decree a sale of so much of the mortgaged property as is sufficient to satisfy the debt due, with interest and costs,<sup>61</sup> at least where no representations are made or it does not appear that the interest of the parties would be better served by a sale of the whole;<sup>62</sup> provided, of course, that the mortgaged property is divisible to advantage.<sup>63</sup> But the parties may stipulate in the mortgage that, in case of foreclosure because of default in payment of interest or a part of the principal, the property shall be sold en masse.<sup>64</sup> And the whole estate may be sold either where the mortgagor assents or where the interests of the mortgagee require it.<sup>65</sup> But it has been held that the court, where a part only of the debt is due, before decreeing a sale of the mortgaged premises as against an infant defendant, must direct an inquiry as to what part of the premises, if any part short of the whole, shall be sold, taking into consideration the best interests of the infant.<sup>66</sup> In some jurisdictions the sale of the mortgaged property where only a part of the debt is due is expressly regulated by statute.<sup>67</sup>

In a few instances stress has been laid upon the fact that the premises were mortgaged as an entirety rather than in parcels, some courts laying down the broad rule that where property is mortgaged as one entire tract and the decree is that the property described in the mortgage be sold, it may be sold in the same way, although it is readily divisible into or even consists of separate identifiable tracts;<sup>68</sup> such courts maintaining that, where the mortgage and the decree describe the land as a single tract, the officer making the same is under no obligation to divide the tract and sell it in parcels, unless the court so decrees. And this notwithstanding a statutory provision that where property is taken on execution the same shall be sold in separate tracts if it is susceptible of division,<sup>69</sup> although this conclusion may perhaps be attributed to a view that such statutes do not apply to sales under decrees of foreclosure;<sup>70</sup> or notwithstanding an applicable statute provides that where the property consists of "several known lots or parcels they must be sold separately," if the property, although consisting of separate and "known buildings," does not consist of "known lots or parcels."<sup>71</sup> These rules have been held to apply to a mortgage of a plantation and the personal property belonging thereto,<sup>72</sup> to separate parcels of suburban and city property,<sup>73</sup> to one entire tract capable of subdivision so that, by sale of a less quantity than the whole, a sufficient sum would be realized to discharge the mortgage fi. fa.; <sup>74</sup> to a single tract of land which the court, for the sake of argument, assumed would bring a larger total price if divided and sold in separate tracts, the action being one to enjoin the sale on foreclosure of the tract en masse; <sup>75</sup> to two tracts upon which were separate buildings, which property was divisible according to buildings and the lands thereunder, but not divisible according to the original tracts; <sup>76</sup> and to a single tract of land which had never been subdivided, in the mortgage of which there was nothing to indicate that it should be subdivided for the purpose of a sale on foreclosure.<sup>77</sup> And some courts have held that the premises covered by a mortgage must all be sold on foreclosure;<sup>78</sup> but several distinct parcels included in a mortgage may be sold to separate purchasers if all the sales are made at one general sale.<sup>79</sup> So, it has been held that, where a debt is secured by a mortgage on several parcels of land, the court has no authority to except any part of the property from sale on foreclosure, even though the value of the property decreed to be sold exceeds the amount of the debt.<sup>80</sup> But in Louisiana the supreme court has expressly repudiated the contention that a mortgage is indivisible and bears on each and every part of the premises so that property mortgaged en masse must be sold in the same manner, holding that mortgaged property which has been divided into lots need not be sold en masse.<sup>81</sup> Other courts do not seem to have expressly repudiated the rule that property mortgaged as an entirety and ordered sold by a decree describing the property in the terms of the mortgage should or must be sold in the same way, but the decisions in a great many of the cases which are treated herein would seem to warrant a more liberal rule, the application of which would in many cases be more beneficial to the parties. In fact, it is more than probable that a rule allowing mortgaged premises to be divided and sold by parcels in some instances would often be more beneficial to the debtor than a sale in solido, and at the same time the creditor would have no ground for objection to the former mode of sale, this being true at least in those cases where the mortgaged premises, or a part or parcel thereof, would sell for enough to satisfy his claims, and under the more liberal rules he would be protected in any event, for if the property were insufficient to raise the required amount, he would be entitled to have it sold in the mode that would bring the greatest return. Of course, even in a majority of those jurisdictions which lay down the narrow rule that sales by the entirety only are permissible under the general decree so describing the property, it would seem that the court could and probably would, upon application of the debtor, decree a sale by parcels, provided such a mode of sale appeared to be more beneficial to the debtor and would not result in injury to the creditor.

A rule similar to the entirety rule just discussed is generally applied to sales of property of a public service corporation mortgaged as an entirety, but the rule in these cases is founded upon the theory that the property is generally held more valuable as a whole, each part being necessary to the proper performance of the public service rendered by the corporation, rather than, as in the immediately preceding cases, the right of the mortgagee to look to the whole of the mortgaged property. Thus, where the real estate, franchises, and other property of a public service corporation are mortgaged as an entirety, it is generally held that it is the duty of the court in foreclosure proceedings to decree the sale, as an entirety, of the whole property so mortgaged,<sup>53</sup> especially where it cannot otherwise be sold to advantage,<sup>54</sup> even though a part only of the debt is due,<sup>55</sup> unless, perhaps, the property can be leased as an entirety for a term of years and for a sum sufficient to satisfy the amount due.<sup>56</sup> And this notwithstanding statutes give a right of redemption from foreclosure sales of real estate.<sup>56</sup> These conclusions are, of course, furthered by the fact that the public interests are to be taken into account and the corporation preserved as a going concern so far as it can be done consistently with the rights of the parties.<sup>87</sup> On the other hand, however, under statutes making the movable property of a public service corporation personality and liable to execution and sale, it has been held that it is not the duty of the court to order a sale of the whole property in bulk as an entirety,<sup>88</sup> although in its discretion it has a power to so order where the debtor requests it and it can be done without prejudice to the creditor.<sup>89</sup> And in such a case a refusal to order a sale in bulk is not error where it does not appear that all the movables are necessary for the operation of the company, but will be regarded as vesting a discretion in the commissioner to sell en masse or in parcels, although the direction was to sell all the property.<sup>90</sup>

Foreclosure under power of sale.

This subdivision includes those cases wherein a mortgage or deed of trust was foreclosed by the exercise of a power of sale contained in the instrument itself.

The parties to a mortgage or deed of trust may contract therein as to the mode in which the property shall be sold upon default,<sup>90</sup> and where they do so provide in express and explicit terms neither the trustee nor the court should disregard the terms of the power,<sup>91</sup> even though unfortunate circumstances caused the debtor to agree to the same.<sup>92</sup>

But in the absence of statutory provision or other controlling direction, a person intrusted with the sale of property upon foreclosure under a power is vested with a discretion as to the mode to be adopted.<sup>93</sup> But even an authorization "to sell said premises entire without division or in parcels," as the trustee might "think best," does not empower the trustee to do absolutely as he pleases, or to do that which would be most convenient for him, such a clause not giving the right of arbitrary discretion.<sup>94</sup> And in fact neither a trustee in a deed of trust nor a mortgagee represents the interest of the cestui que trust or himself alone, but he is also a trustee for the debtor.<sup>95</sup> However, in Ontario it has been held that a mortgagee does not act as a trustee for the mortgagor, but only in pursuance of the powers conferred by the mortgage, and that he may consult his own interest before that of the mortgagor, being liable only for wilful default or neglect.<sup>96</sup>

Where a trustee or mortgagee is vested with a discretion as to the amount of property to be sold or the mode of selling property under a power, he must exercise the same in keeping with the general rule that it is the primary duty of one making a sale to adopt the mode which will probably command the best price, and to exercise his best judgment in determining what is the mode most likely to accomplish that end; as well as to protect the interests of all parties who may be interested in the property.<sup>97</sup> And in determining the proper mode the trustee's duties are not merely formal, but he should inform himself as to the condition of the property so that he may adopt that course which in his judgment will bring the highest price,<sup>98</sup> although in some cases no such duty devolves upon the trustee; as, for example, where the property to be sold consists of one lot only, and cannot be sold otherwise than as one parcel.<sup>99</sup>

And some rules for the guidance of trustees and mortgagees vested with a power of sale can be drawn from the decisions.

Thus, resting upon the reasonable presumption sanctioned by observation and experience, that mortgaged property will produce more when sold in parcels, because the sale is thus accommodated to the probable wants of more possible purchasers,<sup>100</sup> the general rule, when there is a general power of sale, is that, where a tract of land is in parcels distinctly marked for separate and distinct enjoyment, it should be sold, or at least first offered for sale, in parcels,<sup>101</sup> unless it cannot be so sold without injury to the part or parts unsold, in which case the property is properly sold en masse even though a sale of a part thereof would satisfy the debt due.<sup>102</sup> And where property mortgaged consists of parcels or is divisible, and the trustee rightfully sells the same by parcels, he should not sell more of the land than is sufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt,<sup>103</sup> unless, perhaps, the debtor requests that the property all be sold.<sup>104</sup> But it is proper to sell mortgaged property en masse if it first has been offered in parcels and no bids have been received.<sup>105</sup> And notwithstanding the property when mortgaged consisted of several and distinct parcels, if it has been made into a unit which cannot be disintegrated and the parts sold separately without large depreciation and a diminished amount in the aggregate of the yield, it should be sold en masse.<sup>106</sup> And it has been held that, where the mortgage gives a general power "to sell and dispose of such premises," it is for the trustee in good faith to exercise a sound discretion, and to sell the land either as a whole or in parcels as he sees fit, even though it consists of parcels or is easily divisible.<sup>107</sup>

The other phase of the general rule is that, where there is no division of the tract into parcels adapted for separate and distinct enjoyment, the tract should be sold as a whole,<sup>108</sup> unless the party interested should show in some intelligible manner the distinct manner in which the land might be profitably divided for sale,<sup>109</sup> or the reasonable exercise of a discretion clearly indicates that a sale in a mode other than one which an application of the general rule would indicate would be more advantageous to the parties and produce a larger sum.<sup>110</sup> However, it has been held that, where there is a general discretion vested in the trustee, or the power is to sell the whole or so much of the mortgaged premises as may be necessary to satisfy the debt secured, and the property, although entire, is susceptible of advantageous subdivision, the trustee may so divide and sell by parcels.<sup>111</sup> And if it will bring more by being so divided and sold in separate parcels or lots,<sup>112</sup> or if enough of it to satisfy the amount due can be segregated and sold without injury to the residue,<sup>113</sup> it is his duty to so divide and sell, even though express authority was given in the mortgage to sell "all" the property.<sup>114</sup> And it has been held that a trustee should offer for sale in subdivisions if anyone wishes to so bid, even though the property is not readily susceptible of subdivision.<sup>115</sup> However, it has also been said that a trustee having a general power of sale is under no obligation to divide and sell in parcels land consisting of a single tract,<sup>116</sup> especially where the deed of trust authorizes the trustee "to sell the premises," the trustee being bound to pursue his powers strictly and there being no obligation upon him to depart from the terms of his trust,<sup>117</sup> even though a sale of a part of the mortgaged property would have produced enough to satisfy the claim;<sup>117</sup> and this notwithstanding the debtor requested that a part only of the premises be sold.<sup>117</sup> But in Minnesota it has been held that, although a strict observance of a power of sale which authorizes a sale of the whole premises on default is regular, even though a lesser portion of the property would suffice to pay the debt, chancery may interfere upon the application of the mortgagor and restrain the full exercise of the power by the mortgagee where the land greatly exceeds in value the amount of the debt, and confine the sale to such part of the land as may be sufficient to discharge the amount due on the mortgage and costs.<sup>118</sup> But the proper time to make such an application is before the sale takes place, since, where the mortgage confers the power to sell the whole premises, it is presumed that the mortgagee will take advantage of it, and when the mortgagor allows the sale to take place without interference or objection on his part, he must excuse such neglect fully, or a court of chancery will not relieve him.<sup>118</sup>

Even where a mortgage or deed of trust vests a discretion in the trustee to sell the encumbered premises either entire without division or in parcels as he thinks best, such discretion is not an arbitrary one, but generally is subject to the control and direction of the debtor, who may choose the mode of offering the property for sale.<sup>119</sup> But it has been said that, where a mortgage conveys different parcels of the same kind, or different classes of property, the mortgagee may, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, elect for his own benefit the particular property to which he will resort in the first instance,<sup>120</sup> especially if the application is made to the court for an order to that effect and the request seems equitable,<sup>121</sup> and that, in the absence of some peculiar equity growing out of other circumstances, the mortgagor or any person claiming under him cannot compel the mortgagee to exhaust any one of the different parcels or classes of property conveyed by the mortgage to the exclusion of other property conveyed.<sup>122</sup> It is also held, however, that upon a sale under a power in a deed of trust the cestui que trust has no right to give direction as to how the property should be sold, when such direction, if carried out, would result in injury to the debtor.<sup>123</sup> And in Missouri it has been declared that no particular one of the parties interested has the right to control the manner and method of sale, but that the question is one for the exercise of sound discretion by the trustee.<sup>124</sup> But the parties may by joint agreement determine the mode of sale to be adopted.<sup>125</sup>

Foreclosure under statute.

Many jurisdictions now have statutes which control, or at least influence, the mode of procedure upon foreclosure of a mortgage, and many of such statutes have provisions dealing with the questions under consideration in this annotation. These statutes in some instances control foreclosure under power of sale as well as by action or suit, but generally do not affect equitable proceedings.<sup>126</sup> In fact, it has been said that in a statutory foreclosure the aid of a court of equity is not invoked, and that the object of the statute regulating these sales is to have them fairly made, and as nearly in accordance with the principles established by courts of equity in like cases as possible.<sup>127</sup>

Thus, in Michigan, Minnesota, New York, North Dakota, and South Dakota, the adjudications show that the statutes provide that, if mortgaged premises consist of distinct farms, tracts, or lots, they shall be sold separately, and that no more parcels shall be sold than shall be necessary to satisfy the amount due;<sup>128</sup> and by an amendment to the Michigan

And in California statutes having similar provisions with respect to sales of separate pieces of real property upon execution have been held applicable to sales upon strict foreclosure of mortgages<sup>131</sup> when the decree is silent as to the manner or order in which the separate parcels shall be sold.<sup>132</sup> And the mortgagor may direct the order of sale.<sup>133</sup> And in fact where the decree of foreclosure merely follows the general provisions of the statute by ordering a sale of the premises or so much thereof as is necessary, when a part may be sold without material injury to the parties interested, it has been said that, if the defendants desire the property to be sold in separate parcels, they should give direction to that effect at the sale.<sup>134</sup> And where the mortgage contains an express stipulation as to the manner in which the premises shall be sold upon foreclosure, the decree may direct a sale to be made accordingly, it being proper for the court to enforce such a contract.<sup>135</sup>

So, in Oregon a statute providing that, when a sale upon execution is of real property consisting of several known lots or parcels, they should be sold separately or otherwise as is likely to bring the highest price, has been held applicable to sales upon execution upon a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage;<sup>136</sup> but this statute leaves the sale of real property consisting of several known lots entirely to the discretion of the sheriff as to whether he will sell it in parcels or not.<sup>136</sup>

And the Utah statute providing that, when real estate is to be sold on execution and is composed of several known lots, they shall be sold separately has been regarded as applicable to sales on foreclosure of mortgages.<sup>137</sup>

And in Mississippi, by statutory provision (Code 1892, § 2443), lands comprising a single tract which are to be sold under a mortgage or deed of trust shall be sold as lands are required to be sold under execution; viz., they must be offered in subdivisions not exceeding 160 acres and then as an entirety and the mode which will obtain the greater sum shall govern.<sup>138</sup>

Thornton* (1908) 92 Miss. 395, 46 So. 950, holding that the fact that a part of the mortgaged tract was separated from the greater part thereof did not make it a separate tract within the meaning of the statute.

So, in Washington the statutes at one time expressly provided that decrees of foreclosure must be enforced by execution as an ordinary decree for payment of money, and that the sheriff should "sell the mortgaged premises or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the judgment," etc., and the execution provisions stated that, when the sale was of real property and consisted of several known lots or parcels, they should be "sold separately or otherwise as is likely to bring the highest price," etc., and that, where the property to be sold did not consist of known lots or parcels, "the sheriff shall offer the land for sale, the lots or parcels separately or together as he shall deem most advantageous. All lands except town lots to be sold by the acre;"<sup>139</sup> but although these provisions were in part at least repealed by the act of March 10, 1897 (Laws of 1897, p. 70),<sup>140</sup> the provisions relating to sales on execution have largely been retained, and have been applied to sales on foreclosure of mortgages.<sup>141</sup>

So, in Indiana the statutory requirements that, when land is sold by the sheriff upon execution, "if the estate shall consist of several lots, tracts, and parcels, each shall be offered separately, and no more of any real estate shall be offered for sale than shall be necessary to satisfy the execution, unless the same shall not be susceptible of division," applies to sales on foreclosure of a mortgage with like force as to sales on execution.<sup>142</sup> Under this statute it is the duty of the sheriff in the exercise of a sound discretion to determine the question of divisibility where the property consists of one tract,<sup>143</sup> unless the mortgage debtor subdivides the same and requests that the parcels be sold as such and in a certain order,<sup>144</sup> he having the privilege of directing the order of sale of parcels provided a sale in the manner directed does not prejudice the execution plaintiff in the collection of his debt.<sup>145</sup> If the property is divisible and the debtor makes no request, it is the duty of the sheriff to sell no more than enough to make the debt and costs;<sup>146</sup> but if not divisible he may offer the entire premises.<sup>147</sup> However, if the mortgaged estate does consist of several lots, tracts, or parcels, he must offer each separately, and must sell the same if a bid equaling two thirds of the appraised value of a parcel is received, and even the fact that the sale of all the parcels is necessary to satisfy the execution does not justify the sheriff in selling in solido.<sup>147</sup>

But general execution statutes have not universally been held to apply to sales upon foreclosure. This was the attitude taken in an Illinois case,<sup>148</sup> the court declaring that such statutes apply solely to sales under and by execution, and not to sales under a decree of foreclosure.

In Iowa the statutes provide that, when a mortgage or a deed of trust, which latter can be foreclosed only by statute (Act March 30, 1860), is foreclosed, the courts "must direct the mortgaged property or so much thereof as is necessary, to be sold,"<sup>149</sup> and that "so far as practicable the property sold must be only sufficient to satisfy the mortgage foreclosed."<sup>150</sup> And by the statutes the execution debtor has a right to de-

And in Maryland, upon foreclosure of a mortgage, the court, by express statutory provision, may decree that the mortgaged property or so much thereof as may be necessary for the satisfaction of the debt and costs shall be sold.<sup>152</sup>

So, in Virginia the statutes require a trustee in selling property under a deed of trust to "sell the property conveyed by deed or so much thereof as may be necessary."<sup>153</sup> Under this statute it is the duty of the trustee not to sell more of the trust subject than the purposes of the trust require, even though the deed direct him in case of default to sell the trust subject without saying, "so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the purposes of the trust," that being always implied unless a contrary intention plainly appears.<sup>154</sup> But if it is difficult or impossible to do this, as when the property cannot be divided without doing unnecessary injury to the owner, it is duty of the trustee to sell the whole tract, or more of it than is required for the purposes of the trust, especially if so desired by the owner of the land.<sup>154</sup> In fact, it is the duty of the trustee to sell the property as a whole or in separate parcels, according to which mode will be to the best interests of the parties, the only limitation being that he shall not sell more than enough to pay the debt unless necessary;<sup>155</sup> but any requests of the owner that a particular and designated portion of the property be sold ought to be carried into effect if such portion is fully adequate to raise the required amount.<sup>156</sup> And there is no necessity for any preliminary reference to a commission to ascertain and report how much and what part of the property shall be sold, it being the duty of the trustee to determine that question, although, should he meet with any difficulty in so doing, he may ask for a reference.<sup>157</sup> And, of course, where the trustee, acting under a power in the deed of trust, violates or threatens to violate the debtor's rights, the debtor may invoke the intervention and assistance of a court of equity to control the trustee,<sup>158</sup> or to avoid his acts where they have been irregular and prejudicial, provided his own conduct is such that it is not inequitable for him to do so.<sup>159</sup>

And in England by the Conveyancing Act of 1881, § 16, subdiv. 1, a mortgagee has power to sell "the mortgaged property or any part thereof" when the mortgage money has become due.<sup>160</sup>

In Kentucky it has been provided by statute that, before ordering a sale of real property for payment of a debt, the court must be satisfied whether or not the property can be divided without materially impairing its value, and that if all liens on real property be held by the same person it may order a sale of enough of the property to pay the debts then due, unless it appears that it is not susceptible of advantageous subdivision or that for some other reason the sale would cause a sacrifice thereof or seriously prejudice the interests of defendants.<sup>161</sup> Under this statute it is erroneous for the court to decree a sale of the premises en masse if they are divisible, as the debtor is entitled to have the property so offered for sale that a part of it may, if possible, be saved to him, the court being required by statute to determine the divisibility of the mortgaged premises.<sup>162</sup>

Texas has a statutory provision requiring that land in towns and cities be sold by lots,<sup>163</sup> but this statute is not a limitation on the power of the court to order a sale in a mode deemed proper and most conducive to the interests of the parties concerned.<sup>163</sup>

In Indiana it is provided by statute that at a sale under foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate the rents and profits for a specified term of years must first be offered for sale.<sup>164</sup>

And Indiana has a statute providing that upon the sale of land mortgaged to secure trust funds the state auditor "shall make sale of so much of the mortgaged premises, to the highest bidder for cash, as will pay the amount due for principal, interest, damages, and costs, and such sales may be in parcels, so that the whole amount may be realized."<sup>165</sup> Under this particular statute the auditor is not required to offer the mortgaged property for sale in parcels, but "may" do so only where necessary to enable him to realize the necessary amount, an offer of the entire tract not having produced such amount.<sup>166</sup>

And Indiana also has a statute relating to the selling of land mortgaged to the state for the use of the school fund, it being provided that at the sale on a foreclosure of such a mortgage the auditor shall sell so much of the mortgaged premises as will pay the amount due, and that when less than the whole amount is sold the part sold shall be taken in a certain form or shape and in a particular manner as regards location.<sup>166</sup> This contemplates a sale of a less quantity than the whole tract if anyone will pay the amount due for such less quantity.<sup>167</sup> And the provisions are mandatory, and a departure from the prescribed procedure renders the proceeding of no binding force.<sup>168</sup> But the county auditor in making a sale is not required to offer any certain or specific quantity or parcel less than the whole, it being sufficient to merely demand who will take a less quantity than the whole tract and pay the amount due, the land in controversy having been described in the mortgage as an entirety.<sup>169</sup>

In Wisconsin it has been held that Rev. Stat. § 3530 (provisions not set out) sanctions the sale as a whole rather than in separate government subdivisions, of a tract of land constituting a distinct farm which has been used and cultivated as such.<sup>170</sup>

In a few instances statutes have been enacted which define the mode of sale of mortgaged property to be employed where a part only of the debt is due at the time.

Thus, in Indiana, by Rev. Stat. 1843, chap. 29, §§ 461, 462, it was provided that, upon foreclosure of a mortgage securing a debt only partially due at the time, the court should designate by reference the situation of the mortgaged premises, and ascertain whether the same can be sold in parcels without injury to the interests of the parties, and, if such a sale can be had, direct that so much of the premises be sold as will be sufficient to pay the amount then due, but that if the mortgaged premises are so situated that the sale of the whole will be more advantageous to the parties, the decree shall in the first instance be entered for the sale of the whole premises.<sup>171</sup> Under this statute the court is bound to make the inquiry provided for, and where a division is practicable to decree a sale of a portion only, unless it is established that a sale of the whole would be more advantageous to both parties,<sup>172</sup> although it has been held that an omission to make the inquiry and order is not such an error as will authorize a reversal where the defendants appeared and made no motion nor took any exception to the decree;<sup>173</sup> and that the court may inquire into and determine the question of divisibility, etc., at a subsequent term.<sup>174</sup> And in decreeing a sale by parcels of land found to be susceptible of division, the court must specify the division and the particular portion to be sold,<sup>175</sup> it being error even for the court to give the plaintiff power to direct the order in which the several parcels shall be sold.<sup>176</sup> And mortgaged property may be decreed to be sold as a whole where it is established that a sale in parcels would be injurious, even though such property consists of distinct tracts or parcels.<sup>177</sup> But the provisions of this statute cannot be invoked unless there are instalments of the debt yet to become due when the foreclosure is sought.<sup>178</sup>

So, in New York at an early date it was provided that where the mortgage debt was not all due a reference should be had to ascertain and report the situation of the mortgaged premises, and that, if it appeared from the report that the premises could be sold in parcels without injury to the interests of the parties, then so much only was to be sold as would be sufficient to pay the amount then due with costs, etc.<sup>179</sup> The provisions of this statute should be strictly observed<sup>180</sup> and are imperative upon the court.<sup>181</sup> And under this statute the duty of the referee has been defined as follows: "This provision of the statute relates entirely to the material condition of the mortgaged property. If the referee finds that the property cannot be sold in parcels, as he would be bound to do in cases where it is indivisible for use or enjoyment, as in the case of a mill, a store, a dwelling house, or a farm, or single piece of property, whose value consisted in keeping it together in its unity or entirety, such finding will practically end his duties under the order. And so it will be if he finds that the mortgaged premises consist of distinct parcels of land whose relative value is entirely independent of each other. In such cases he will so report, and the land must be sold accordingly. But if he finds that the mortgaged premises consist of a large tract of land, he will then inquire whether such tract can be subdivided and sold in distinct parcels without impairing its aggregate value, and if so in what parcels, or whether the premises are so situated that the sale of the whole in one parcel will be most beneficial to the parties. So far as the duty of the referee is concerned under this branch of the order of reference, the inquiry is simply how can the mortgaged premises be sold so as to realize therefrom the greatest amount of money?"<sup>182</sup> And applying the foregoing rules it is held that the courts should direct a sale en masse where the report shows that such mode would be more beneficial to the parties, even though the property had been cut up into a large quantity of lots and blocks and so planted.<sup>183</sup>

And in Minnesota when a mortgage is given to secure the payment of money payable in instalments, if the mortgaged premises consist of separate and distinct farms or tracts, only such tract or tracts should be sold as are sufficient to satisfy the instalment or instalments then due; but if the premises do not consist of separate and distinct farms and tracts, the whole shall be sold, etc.<sup>184</sup>

And in California and Utah the statutes provide that, if the debt for which a mortgage is held is not all due, as soon as sufficient of the property has been sold to pay the amount due with costs, the sale must cease, etc.; but that, if the property cannot be sold in portions without injury to the parties, the whole may be ordered to be sold in the first instance, etc.<sup>184</sup>

In New Jersey it is provided that when all the mortgage money is not due, and it shall appear that a part of the mortgaged premises cannot be sold to satisfy the amount due without material injury to the remainder, and it is just and reasonable that the whole should be sold together, a decree that a sale of the whole be made is lawful.<sup>185</sup>

In some jurisdictions statutes of the character hereinbefore treated are held to be directory merely, and a sale en masse will not be disturbed unless the parcels were sold fraudulently, or it is shown that the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption was damaged thereby.<sup>186</sup> But in other cases the statutes have been held mandatory and the duties imposed imperative.<sup>187</sup>

And generally compliance with the statutory method of sale in parcels may be waived by the parties.<sup>188</sup>

Under statutes relating to execution and sheriff's sales by parcels, it is the duty of the sheriff to make the sale of the separate and distinct lots separately;<sup>189</sup> or where the property is divided or is divisible and the statute provides that where practicable no more shall be sold than is necessary, to sell enough only to satisfy the mortgage,<sup>190</sup> unless a decree of the court directs another mode of sale, in which case the statute has been held not to be applicable;<sup>191</sup> or unless the property is first offered in parcels and no bid is received, in which cases the statutes are regarded either as not applicable<sup>192</sup> or as sufficiently complied with,<sup>193</sup> so that the property may be sold en masse; or unless upon offering the mortgaged property as a whole it brings more money than was bid upon an offer of sale by parcels;<sup>194</sup> or unless, as in California, in case of a failure of the court to decree the mode of sale, the mortgagor, pursuant to the statute, points out the mode of sale desired by him.<sup>195</sup>

Where statutes provide that the court must determine the advisability of division of mortgaged property upon a sale thereof, and the court after determination decrees a certain mode of sale, the officer making the sale must follow the order prescribed in the decree.<sup>196</sup> But, generally speaking, it is not incumbent upon the court to find whether or not it will be to the advantage of the defendant to have separate parcels sold separately, or to subdivide the premises for that purpose,<sup>197</sup> unless the statute provides that it must inquire or be satisfied before making a decree.<sup>198</sup> But even though it is not incumbent upon the court to find regarding the advisability of subdivision or separate sales, it may divide the property or decree the order of sale, and in such a case the officer making the sale has no right to exercise a discretion, but must follow the decree.<sup>199</sup>

Avoidance of sales.

It is the purpose of the annotator to treat under this title those cases in which an attempt has been made to avoid a foreclosure sale upon the ground that it was either of a wrong amount of mortgaged property or was made in a wrong mode, regard being given principally to the question what error or irregularities afford sufficient ground for the setting aside of a foreclosure sale.

In the first place it may be stated that generally it is presumed that the method adopted by a mortgagee or trustee was the one best calculated to realize the greatest amount for the property sold,<sup>200</sup> as is required by the rules stated in the preceding subdivisions.

And likewise the general rule is that, where a wrong mode is pursued in selling property under a mortgage foreclosure, the sale is not absolutely void, but rather is voidable only.<sup>201</sup> And this is true even though applicable statutory provisions are to the effect that where the mortgaged property consists of separate and distinct parcels it shall be sold in parcels.<sup>202</sup> But in Indiana,<sup>303</sup> Michigan,<sup>304</sup> and Mississippi,<sup>305</sup> the courts, proceeding upon the assumption that the provisions of the statutes are mandatory rather than merely directory, have declared that a sale made in violation of such provisions was "void;" and in some of them, perhaps, it was necessary to go to that extent, but others involve only a direct attack upon the sale, and therefore do not necessarily require a characterization of the sale as void. However, in Indiana<sup>306</sup> and Michigan,<sup>307</sup> the declarations in some of the earlier cases so characterizing the sale have been repudiated, or, at least, qualified and explained in later cases, thereby again demonstrating that the legal implications of the term "void" as employed by the courts are at best uncertain, and that it is necessary in this connection to observe the actual question involved in the case in which the term is employed. And even in the jurisdictions which apply the rule that the adoption of a wrong mode renders a sale void, it seems that, where mortgaged premises which are divisible have never been subdivided, a sale thereof as a whole is not absolutely void, unless the propriety of a division was so palpable and clear that a sale without division would operate as a fraud upon the execution defendant and amount to an abuse of official discretion.<sup>308</sup>

<sup>308</sup> Bardeus v. Huber (1873) 45 Ind. 235, wherein, in so holding, it was also held that under the facts in the suit the sale was void; Stotsenburg v. Stotsenburg (1881) 75 Ind. 538, holding that a sale of mortgaged premises as a whole was voidable where the same was susceptible of subdivision and of sale in parcels sufficient to satisfy the execution; Jones v. Kokomo Bldg. Asso. (Ind.)

Assuming, then, that the fact that an unnecessary amount of property is sold, or that an irregular mode is pursued, renders a sale voidable only, the question arises as to what circumstances constitute grounds upon which a sale will be set aside. And numerous courts have laid down rules upon this phase of the question. Thus it has often been said that courts will not set aside a sale under foreclosure for light or trivial reasons, but that, generally speaking, it must appear that there has been a material departure from the mandates of the decree or the law governing such sales, to the substantial injury or prejudice of the party seeking to set the sale aside.<sup>209</sup> So, it has been declared that it required good and substantial grounds to justify the court in setting aside a sale on foreclosure of a mortgage when regularly made, for otherwise all confidence would be destroyed and the public would be loath ever to bid for property thus offered.<sup>210</sup> And in fact several courts have maintained that, in order to obtain the aid of a court of equity to avoid a sale under a mortgage or a deed of trust, there must be some fraud, unfair dealing, or abuse, by the officer making the sale, of the confidence reposed in him, or some injury resulting from a sale made in one mode rather than in another, in which it is contended that it should have been made.<sup>211</sup> And it has often been broadly ruled that it is only upon the ground of fraud or the ground that someone must have been substantially prejudiced, as by the working of an actual injustice or wrong, by a sale of mortgaged property en masse, that equity will set the sale aside because the property was not sold in parcels.<sup>212</sup>

And applying these general rules, it is generally held that the sale of mortgaged property en bloc rather than in parcels, as it should have been, or vice versa, or in different sized parcels, is a mere irregularity which alone does not constitute a sufficient ground for setting it aside, where it is not shown that the contesting party was materially injured thereby.<sup>213</sup> In other words, it has been said that the mortgagor will not be heard to complain of an irregularity such as selling the property in a wrong manner, if it brought a fair price,<sup>214</sup> even though it is possible that if it had been sold in a different manner it might by some fortuitous circumstances have brought more than its actual value.<sup>215</sup> And a mere irregularity which does not render a sale void is not available in an outside or collateral attack on the title supra, holding that the sale in question, though in solido, whereas it should have been in parcel, was voidable only.

transferred by the sale.<sup>216</sup> And it has been held that, although the mortgaged premises consisted of separate parcels and the sale of the first was for enough to satisfy the mortgage debt, the fact that the sheriff proceeded to sell the other parcels does not render him a wrongdoer, but that the sale was at most an irregularity which cannot be questioned after acknowledgment of the deed, the sheriff having acted within the command of his writ, which was to seize and sell the mortgaged premises.<sup>217</sup> So a mere error of judgment in the selection of the mode of sale, whereby some injury may have resulted, has been held not to constitute a ground for avoidance of a sale,<sup>218</sup> since all certainty and stability would be stripped from such sales and their validity would depend upon mere vague speculation.<sup>219</sup> And where the mode of sale is discretionary with the officer, a sale will not be set aside because one mode rather than another was adopted, unless the manner of sale was so palpably injurious as to amount to an abuse of discretion, in which case it would be a fraud upon the parties.<sup>219</sup> And the fact that the official making the sale was in duty bound to follow the terms of the decree of sale, and that he departed therefrom, does not warrant the setting aside of the sale at the suit of parties who were not in fact damaged by such departure from the decree.<sup>220</sup> And a judgment decreeing the sale of mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be necessary, "in one tract or parcel," will not be reversed on appeal, where it does not affirmatively appear that the mortgaged premises consisted of separate and distinct tracts or parcels.<sup>221</sup> So it has been ruled that a decree allowing a sale of mortgaged premises as an entirety, they having been originally described as one lot, will not be disturbed where there is nothing to show that the land should have been sold in parcels, and a sale pursuant to such a decree will not be disturbed.<sup>222</sup> And injury cannot be presumed from mere irregularity.<sup>223</sup> Nor will a sale be set aside as a mere experiment,<sup>224</sup> except, perhaps, where it appears that the debtor may possibly be injured by a refusal and he gives security that the creditor shall be none the worse off for such experiment.<sup>225</sup>

Of course, where the sale was under a power and the court can find nothing unreasonable or prejudicial with respect to the mode adopted, it is not justified in setting the sale aside,<sup>226</sup> especially where the debtor was present at the sale which were two houses, where the lot, which had never been subdivided, was conveyed as a whole, and it required little proof to establish the belief that a sale by parcels would have produced no good results, the regularity of the sale having been attacked on the ground that the property was sold as a whole without first having been offered in parcels; Cleaver v. Green (1803) 107 Ill. 67, holding that a sale as one parcel, of a suburban lot no larger than many others in the same neighborhood which were used for single residences, could not be avoided for failure to divide the same, there being nothing in the deed of trust imposing such a duty. *Singleton v. and neither suggested nor requested a different mode of sale,<sup>227</sup> or where the defendant does not even offer to redeem and does not ask any equitable relief, he simply introducing a sale in bulk as a defense in an action of ejectment.<sup>228</sup> Likewise a sale upon strict foreclosure, where the officer making the sale determined the mode to be pursued, cannot be avoided upon the ground that the mortgaged property consisted of separate and distinct parcels, or was divisible, but was sold en masse, it appearing that the sale in the manner or mode adopted was the most advantageous to all parties or, at least, was not prejudicial to any.<sup>229</sup>

W. 374, holding that the mere statement that the trustee had sold land in bulk and had refused the request of the plaintiff to sell a less quantity and his offer to bid the amount due for any certain number of acres in the tract, to the injury of the plaintiff, did not warrant the setting aside of the sale, there being nothing to show the true nature and character of the property, its susceptibility of division, or any abuse of discretion or confidence on the part of the trustee in making the sale, or to show that in conducting such sale he in any manner acted otherwise than impartially with all the parties in interest, or did not exercise a proper and sound discretion in adopting the method and manner of sale employed; Kline v. And a sale made in accordance with the determination of the court reached pursuant to the terms of a statute requiring it to determine the divisibility, etc., of the mortgaged land, will not be interfered with where the judgment of the court appears to have been justified.<sup>230</sup> And where the mortgagor objects to a sale en masse and requests that a certain division be made and the parcels sold separately, which request is acceded to, it seems that the mortgagor cannot afterwards object to the sale in that mode.<sup>231</sup>

But courts of equity will set aside a sale under a mortgage or deed of trust where the officer making the same has been guilty of fraud, partiality, or prejudicial misconduct.<sup>232</sup> And failure to sell in the manner which was known to be most likely to produce the largest price has been held to be sufficient reason for avoiding the sale.<sup>233</sup> And for a better reason where the sale is en masse and should have been in parcels, or vice versa, and actually brings a price greatly below the actual value of the property, it cannot be sustained against the objection of the debtor showing that there is reasonable ground for believing that it was less beneficial to him than it would have been had a reasonable mode been pursued.<sup>234</sup> And a failure to sell in a mode which a reasonable exercise of the seller's judgment would have shown to be the most probable means of bringing the largest price is a good ground of objection to the sale, where the price obtained was altogether inadequate.<sup>235</sup> So a sale may be set aside where the officer making the same

violates his duty to exercise a discretion vested in him to act in good faith for the best interests of the parties.<sup>236</sup> And it has been held that an arbitrary sale of separate and distinct parcels as a whole may be set aside by the court upon the coming in of the report, where the sale should have been by parcels.<sup>237</sup> And relief will be granted where it clearly appears that a trustee in a deed of trust has not kept within the authority conferred upon him, and has not sold the property to the best advantage.<sup>238</sup> And a sale may be set aside in equity where it appears that the trustee sold the premises en masse rather than in parcels as insisted upon by the debtor, which latter mode would have been more advantageous.<sup>239</sup> So, where, upon a sale of land by parcels or of land which is divisible, more land is arbitrarily sold than is necessary to pay the mortgage debt and costs, the court may set the sale aside,<sup>240</sup> except, perhaps, as against an innocent purchaser for value.<sup>241</sup> And a sale en masse of property which is divisible may be set aside if a part only of the property would have been sufficient to satisfy the claim.<sup>242</sup> And a decree directing the sale of the whole of mortgaged premises which are divisible is erroneous where only a part of the mortgage debt is due and a sale of a part of the property would satisfy the portion of the mortgage debt due at the time.<sup>243</sup> And it has been held that a sale en masse in violation of a statute is an irregularity, to correct which the defendant has a remedy by motion to set aside the sale on notice to the creditor, the officer making the sale, and the purchaser at the sale, even though it is established that the property brought more than it would on a resale,<sup>244</sup> it being said that to uphold such a sale would be to deprive the judgment debtor of his right to redeem any one of the separate parcels;<sup>245</sup> but, of course, where a sale is legally made en masse, it will not be set aside simply because, in order to redeem any of the property, a judgment debtor must redeem it all.<sup>246</sup> So a decree under a statute providing that the court "must direct the mortgaged property, or so much thereof as is necessary, to be sold," which orders a sale of the entire premises, has been held error upon the ground that the order of sale should be conditional, and not absolute.<sup>247</sup> And a sale in violation of a statutory requirement that so far as practicable the property sold must be only sufficient to satisfy the mortgage foreclosed and costs will be set aside upon motion or proceeding in equity by the proper party for that purpose,<sup>248</sup> although it has been said that the fact that separate parcels were not sold separately is a mere irregularity which in and advantageously divided, should be set aside; American Ins. Co. v. Oakley (1841) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 259, holding the same as Chesley v. Chesley (Mo.) supra; Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Hinman (1856) 3 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 455, holding the same as next preceding case.

the absence of fraud does not affect the title of the purchaser.<sup>249</sup> And where more property is sold than is necessary to satisfy the mortgage debt and costs, and the statute provides that the court may decree a sale of the mortgaged property or so much thereof as may be necessary for the satisfaction of the debt and costs, the sale may be set aside.<sup>250</sup> And, of course, where the statute unqualifiedly provides that upon the sale of mortgaged property consisting of separate and distinct farms, tracts, or lots, the parcels shall be sold separately, and forbids the sale of more parcels than necessary to satisfy the claims, a sale of more parcels than necessary constitutes grave error.<sup>251</sup> So a sale en masse without inquiry as to the divisibility of the premises and the propriety of a sale of a part only, as required by statute, is irregular and may be set aside on motion.<sup>252</sup> And a sale made under a decree of foreclosure which absolutely requires separate government subdivisions owned by different persons to be sold en masse will be set aside where no imperative reasons for such a decree are present,<sup>253</sup> and a clause in the trust deed authorizing the trustee in his discretion to sell the property en masse cannot avail to support the decree.<sup>253</sup> And a sale made in violation of the terms of a decree made under a statute requiring the court to determine the advisability of dividing mortgaged property for the purposes of sale will be set aside as prejudicial.<sup>254</sup> And where the statutes permit the execution debtor to demand that a sale be made according to a plan furnished by him, and the officer disregards the same, the sale should be set aside, it appearing that the plan furnished was intelligible and easily made certain.<sup>255</sup>

But a sale en masse cannot be avoided upon the ground that a statutory requirement that separate and distinct parcels be sold in parcels was not complied with, where it does not clearly appear that the land in question consisted of separate and distinct parcels.<sup>256</sup>

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAIL- ROAD COMPANY, Appt., v. COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(171 Ky. 355, 188 S. W. 394.)

Commerce — duty to equip interstate train with coaches for colored passengers.

1. A transfer train operated by a railroad to take its passengers to and from a city located near its line, but in another state, which travels between two stations in the state where the road is located, is, as far as traffic between such stations is concerned, within its statute requiring equipment for both white and colored passengers.

For other cases, see Commerce, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — As to cumulative penalties for failure of carrier to provide separate accommodations for white and colored persons, see annotation following this case, post, 548.

Carrier — accommodations for white and colored races — demand for.

2. To subject a carrier to a penalty for failure to equip its trains with separate accommodations for white and colored passengers, an actual demand for accommodations by members of both races need not be shown.

For other cases, see Carriers, IV. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Criminal law — continuing offense — single conviction.

3. But one conviction can be had for failure to equip a particular train with accommodations for both white and colored passengers prior to the finding of the indictment first tried, where the train remains the same as to schedule time and equipment from day to day, although it is broken up each night and reassembled in the morning, where the penalty provided is for each offense, and not for each day's violation of the statute.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, II. g, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEALS by defendant from judgments of the Circuit Court for Kenton County convicting it, under two indictments, of operating trains without providing separate coaches for white and colored passengers. Affirmed in first case. Reversed in second case.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. D. Warfield and S. D. Rouse for appellant.

Messrs. M. M. Logan, Attorney General, and Overton S. Hogan, Assistant Attorney General, for the Commonwealth:

The trial of the first indictment was not a bar to the trial of the second indictment.

Clarke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grand jury of Kenton county, at its February, 1916, term, returned two indictments against the appellant, charging it with operating a passenger train in Kenton county between its Covington and Latonia stations without providing separate coaches for white and colored passengers, as provided by § 795 of the Kentucky Statutes. One of these indictments, No. 3134, charged the commission of the offense on the ——— day of April, 1915, and the other indictment, No. 3142, charged the commission of the offense therein on the ——— day of May, 1915.

Upon the trial of the first case the commonwealth introduced the testimony of C. W. Schultz, conductor on the train, who testified that in April, 1915, the appellant operated a passenger train, known as the "Transfer," between Union Central Depot in Cincinnati and Covington and Latonia stations in Kentucky; that the train consisted of an engine and one coach, and that the coach was not divided into compartments; that both interstate and intrastate passengers were carried on this train; that the train made several trips each way daily; that after its last regular run the engine was sent to the roundhouse and the coach placed on a sidetrack for the night. Appellant introduced no witnesses, and the court instructed the jury to find it guilty, and to impose a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,500. The jury fixed the fine at $500.

Upon the trial of the second indictment the case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, in effect the same as the testimony given by the conductor on the former trial, except that the time of the commission of the acts was fixed upon May 1, 1915. The court again instructed the jury to find appellant guilty, and this jury fixed the penalty at $625.

Separate appeals from these two judgments were prosecuted, but by agreement are heard together. Three reasons for reversal are urged by appellant: (1) That the separate coach law does not apply to the train in question; (2) that the evidence does not show that any negroes applied for passage upon the occasions named in the indictments, and that there is no violation of the law unless the company fails to provide separate coaches as needed; (3) that the offense is a continuing one, and that one conviction is a bar to another conviction for all violations occurring before the date of the indictment upon which the first conviction was had.

1. It is argued that because the train in question is simply a transfer train, operated by appellant to accommodate its passengers going to and from Cincinnati, with a choice of two passenger stations in said city, that the business it does is largely interstate, and that the business performed within the state is trivial and incidental as compared with the principal business, that this train, therefore, is not subject to the provisions of § 795 of the Statutes. The indictments charged and the proof shows that the train in question is operated by appellant within the state between the Covington and Latonia stations upon appellant's line of railroad in the state. Appellant's argument is based upon the assumption that this train is not operated within the state, and is therefore not subject to the provisions of § 795 of the Kentucky Statutes, under which this charge is prosecuted. This assumption is erroneous, because the proven operation between the two Kentucky stations brings this train within the provisions of that statute. Appellant's whole argument upon this question is therefore based upon a false premise and is of no force. Even if it is conceded as stated by appellant, that the principal business of this particular train is interstate, and it is not operated in intrastate commerce "except incidentally, casually, and obliquely," the fact nevertheless remains that the train is operated within the state. It also results that, as this record presents no questions of interstate commerce, the constitutionality of the act under which the charge is drawn cannot be questioned here. Ohio Valley R. Co. v. Lander, 104 Ky. 431, 47 S. W. 344, 882; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Com. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 228, 51 S. W. 160; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 179 U. S. 388, 45 L. ed. 244, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 133 U. S. 587, 33 L. ed. 784, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 801, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 348; Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1138.

2. Appellant contends that, in order to sustain an indictment for failure to provide separate coaches for the travel of white and colored passengers, it is necessary for the commonwealth to prove upon the occasions in question that passengers of both races desired transportation; that there can be no violation of the statute unless there was in fact a passenger of the particular race for whom a separate compartment was not provided; that, while the proof here shows there was but one coach or compartment, appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction should have been sustained, because there was a failure in the proof to show that passengers of the other race desired transportation upon that occasion. This raises a question not heretofore passed L.R.A.1917B.

upon in this state. Counsel for appellant do not cite any authority in support of their contention, and in the only case cited by appellee (Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Com. 119 Ky. 519, 84 S. W. 566), while the opinion states there were no colored passengers on the train at the time the defendant failed to furnish a separate compartment for that race, that fact was not presented as a defense and is not considered in the opinion.

The only case that we have been able to find which treats of this particular question is Southern Kansas R. Co. v. State, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 218, 99 S. W. 166. In that case the court, under a Texas statute which, in substantially the same terms as our statute, required common carriers to provide separate coaches for the white and colored races, disallowed the defense that appellant is urging here. The applicable part of our statute requires common carriers "to furnish separate coaches or cars for the travel or transportation of the white and colored passengers on their respective lines or railroad." The Texas statute provides that common carriers "shall provide separate coaches for the accommodation of white and negro passengers." While the language of the two statutes is not identical, the evident purpose of both is the same. Unquestionably the legislatures of the two states, in the enactment of these statutes, intended to accomplish the same things in the same way, and no difference in construction could be sustained upon any difference in the language employed in one from the other. Therefore, unless the reasons advanced in support of the construction of the Texas statute are unsound or inadequate, the same conclusions ought to be reached in the construction of our statute. We quote the following from the opinion in the Texas case: "We think the plain requirement of the statute is that railroad companies doing business in this state as common carriers of passengers for hire must provide separate coaches, whether the particular train is actually carrying at the time both white and negro passengers or not. If the train is one 'carrying passengers,' the company should be deemed to know that negro passengers may at any time demand carriage thereon, and is required to anticipate such a contingency by making preparations therefor. While the object of the legislature was undoubtedly to provide for the segregation of the races upon passenger trains in this state, yet it clearly sought to reach this end by requiring railroad companies to equip their trains carrying passengers with separate coaches, and it is for a failure in this respect that the penalty is imposed. Furthermore, each . . . vehicle or compartment of a coach, as provided in § 3, must bear in some conspicuous place appropriate words in plain letters, indicating the race for which it is set apart."

From which it will be seen that the legislative intent in the enactment of the law is interpreted to be (1) the segregation of the races upon passenger trains, and (2) to accomplish this end by requiring railroad companies to equip their passenger trains with separate coaches. If it was the legislative will, as it undoubtedly was, that the desired purpose should be attained by requiring the railroad companies to equip their trains in the manner prescribed, it will not do to say, as is argued by counsel for appellant, that the companies may take the chance of their being upon a particular train or a particular trip no passengers of one of the races. We do not think that the legislature intended that railroad companies might speculate, subject only to a fine in the event that they guessed wrongly upon this matter, but are of the opinion that it was clearly the intention that all railroad trains should be equipped with separate accommodations for the two races, and that there is a violation of the provisions of the statute whenever a railroad company fails to so equip any of its passenger trains, without regard to whether or not passengers of both races desire passage upon a particular trip or train.

3. Our conclusion upon the second proposition above in a large measure determines our decision of the third proposition. As stated above, the statute is violated when a railroad company fails to equip any of its trains with separate coaches for the two races. We now come to consider whether or not a conviction for failure to provide the required equipment upon a particular train in the month of April is a bar for a failure to provide such equipment for the same train in May. Appellee attempts to show that this was a different train each day by proof of the fact that the train was broken up each night and reassembled the next morning. This, however, does not result, as it was the same train every day, operated in exactly the same service and upon the same schedule, with the same equipment and the same crew of operators. As we have above construed the law, appellant's offense consisted in the failure to equip this transfer train with separate coaches, and the offense was continuous, provable by a single act, and the failure upon separate days to comply with the law supplies but cumulative evidence of the one violation. The statute does not provide a penalty for each day's violation; the penalty being for each offense.

of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 154 Ky. 293, 157 S. W. 369, as sustaining their contention that each day the train was operated without separate compartments was a separate violation of the law. We do not so regard the opinion in that case, but, upon the other hand, consider it strong support for our conclusion here. In that case the railroad company was indicted for its failure to block the frogs on its tracks, as provided by § 780 of the Statutes, and the court held that the failure to block each frog constituted a separate offense, just as here we hold the failure to equip each train as required is a separate offense. The court there was not asked to, and did not, decide that a separate offense was committed each day for each frog not blocked, and we find nothing in that opinion to authorize here a finding that a separate offense was committed each day a certain train was not equipped with separate coaches.

Counsel for appellee have cited many other authorities, too numerous for us to refer to them all, none of which, in our judgment, is contrary to our conclusion here. In the case of State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co. 133 Ind. 69, 18 L.R.A. 502, 32 N. E. 817, cumulative penalties were permitted for each violation of the provisions of an act which required railroad companies to provide a blackboard at each telegraph station, and to post a report thereon of whether or not each train would arrive on schedule time, and, if late, how much. Cumulative penalties were allowed for each failure to post notice when each train would arrive, upon the ground that the statute clearly made each failure to post such notice a separate offense. That statute provides a penalty "for each violation of the act in failing to report or in making a false report," and in clearly defining what constitutes a separate offense is different from our statute.

In the case of People v. Spencer, 201 N. Y. 105, 94 N. E. 614, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 818, one conviction was held not to be a bar to a subsequent conviction under a statute prohibiting the manufacture and sale of adulterated vinegar and the misbranding of any package containing such vinegar, and providing further a penalty for each violation. Cumulative penalties were there allowed because clearly authorized by the statute. In the course of the opinion the court said: "We must look to the language of the statute to see whether, and when, cumulative penalties are permitted in actions of this character. In repeated decisions this court has refused to recognize a right to recover them, unless clearly authorized. The theory of such prosecutions has been considered to be to administer a warning not to continue the acts complained of. Generally the purpose of the legislature will be sufficiently subserved when one violation, or one default, is recovered for, which shall act as a deterrent upon continuing to disregard the statute."

This is a clear statement of the principle generally recognized under which cumulative penalties are permitted. The statute before us not only does not clearly provide a penalty for each day the statute is violated, but, upon the other hand, provides only a penalty for each offense. As we have before stated, the offense under the statute before us is committed by failure to equip with separate coaches each train, and not for each time a particular train is operated. The following cases, we believe, support our conclusion: Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 120 Ky. 724, 87 S. W. 1090; Wilson v. Com. 119 Ky. 769, 82 S. W. 427; Com. v. Crowell, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1182, 60 S. W. 179; Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 30 L. ed. 658, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; United States v. Boston & M. R. Co. (D. C.) 168 Fed. 148; United States v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (C. C.) 107 Fed. 870; United States v. Boston & A. R. Co. (D. C.) 15 Fed. 209; United States v. Patty (D. C.) 9 Miss. 429, 2 Fed. 664.

It therefore results that the conviction under indictment No. 3134 was a bar to the prosecution under indictment No. 3142, and any other prosecution for the failure to equip this transfer train as required by the separate coach law prior to the finding of the indictment first tried.

Wherefore the judgment in the first case is affirmed, and the judgment in the second case is reversed, with directions to dismiss the indictment.

Annotation—Cumulative penalties for failure of carrier to provide separate accommodations for white and colored persons.

An extended search and examination of cases involving "separate coach laws" discloses no case other than LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. v. Com. ante, 544, which has passed upon the question whether or not cumulative penalties may be recovered for failure of a carrier to provide separate accommodations, etc., for white and colored persons, or whether a conviction or acquittal upon one indictment for such a failure bars a subsequent prosecution for other violations of the statute prior to the first indictment. However, similar questions have arisen in connection with a great variety of statutes relating to other subjects, some of which are illustrated by the cases cited in LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. v. Com. And see State v. Freeman, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 977, and the annotation thereto, which treats the question of conviction or acquittal of sale of liquor as a bar to a prosecution for sales made prior to the first indictment. And see also annotation to Muckenfuss v. State, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783, for a treatment of the question of violations of Sunday laws as a continuing offense.

Mr. Frank E. McGray also for respondent.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

A pole erected in one of the streets of defendant city and used solely for the purpose of supporting a telegraph wire and an alarm box of the fire alarm system belonging to the city fire department fell because it had rotted through where it entered the ground. Plaintiff's son, a boy fourteen years of age, and several other boys, were playing in the street. In falling, the cross-arm upon the pole struck and killed plaintiff's son. Plaintiff brought suit for damages and recovered a verdict. Defendant appealed from an order denying the usual alternative motion for judgment or a new trial.

In providing fire protection, the city is exercising a public or governmental function and is not liable for damages resulting from negligence in the performance of the duties which devolve upon its fire department. Grube v. St. Paul, 34 Minn. 402, 26 N. W. 228; Miller v. Minneapolis, 75 Minn. 131, 77 N. W. 788, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 183. But it is well settled that the city is liable for damages resulting from negligently permitting a dangerous condition to exist in its streets. This is a firmly established exception to the rule that a city is not liable in damages for negligence in the performance of its governmental functions. Shartle v. Minneapolis, 17 Minn. 308, Gil. 284; Bohen v. Waseca, 32 Minn. 176, 50 Am. Rep. 564, 19 N. W. 730; Blyhl v. Waterville, 57 Minn. 115, 47 Am. St. Rep. 596, 58 N. W. 817; Snider v. St. Paul, 51 Minn. 406, 18 L.R.A. 151, 53 N. W. 763; Lane v. Minnesota State Agri. Soc. 62 Minn. 175, 29 L.R.A. 708, 64 N. W. 382; Schigley v. Waseca, 106 Minn. 94, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 689, 118 N. W. 259, 16 Ann. Cas. 169; Sundell v. Tintah, 117 Minn. 170, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1127, 134 N. W. 639, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1311; Ackeret v. Minneapolis, 129 Minn. 190, L.R.A.1915D, 1111, 151 N. W. 976. L.R.A.1917B.

Defendant insists that the fact that the pole was used exclusively for the purposes of the fire department brings the case within the rule which absolves the city from liability for injuries resulting from negligence on the part of its fire department, notwithstanding the fact that the pole was located in the street and rendered the street unsafe. The charter of the city provides that the commissioner of public works "shall be charged with the construction, control and supervision of all sidewalks, streets, lanes, pathways, bridges, alleys, public levees and sewers, and it is hereby made the duty of said commissioner at all times to have and to keep all the sidewalks, streets, lanes, pathways, bridges, alleys, and public levees in a cleanly condition, passable and safe for public use and travel."

Whether this provision requires the city to exercise greater care than the previously existing law exacted, or is merely declaratory of the previously existing law, it makes clear the fact that the duty is imposed upon the city to keep its streets safe for public use at all times. The precise question now presented does not appear to have been directly passed upon by this court; but it is well settled that the city is liable for a dangerous condition of its streets caused by the acts of third parties, committed either with or without the consent of the city. Cleveland v. St. Paul, 18 Minn. 279, Gil. 255; Estelle v. Lake Crystal, 27 Minn. 243, 6 N. W. 775; Hoppe v. Winona, 113 Minn. 252, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449, 129 N. W. 577, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 247, 3 N. C. C. A. 128. While the city is not liable for negligence of the officers of its fire department in performing their official duties, it is liable for negligence in failing to keep its streets safe. And we see little room for making a distinction between a dangerous condition of the street caused by a third party for whose acts the city is not responsible, and a dangerous condition caused by a department of the city for whose negligence the city is not liable. It is the duty of the city to exercise reasonable care to keep its streets free from danger, and it possesses the power to do whatever is necessary to accomplish this purpose. If, through negligence, it fails to perform this duty and injury results from a dangerous condition in one of its streets, the city cannot avoid liability by showing that negligence in caring for an instrumentality used in the performance of a governmental duty is what brought about the dangerous condition. Palestine v. Siler, 225 Ill. 630, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 205, 80 N. E. 345; Emery v. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 492, 57 Atl. 977, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 563; Twist v. Rochester, 37 App. Div. 307, 55 N. Y. Supp. 850, affirmed in 165 N. Y. 619, 59 N. E. 1131;

Walters v. Carthage, 36 S. D. 11, 153 N. W. 881, 10 N. C. C. A. 884; Circleville v. Sohn, 59 Ohio St. 285, 69 Am. St. Rep. 777, 52 N. E. 788, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 704. See also Blyhl v. Waterville, 57 Minn. 115, 47 Am. St. Rep. 596, 58 N. W. 817; Kleopfert v. Minneapolis, 90 Minn. 158, 95 N. W. 908, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 381. If the city permits the dangerous condition to continue after it knew, or ought to have known, of its existence, and after it has had a reasonable opportunity to protect the public from the danger, the city cannot excuse its failure to perform its duty of keeping its streets safe, and relieve itself from liability for such omission, by showing that the dangerous condition of the street resulted from acts done in the performance of another governmental duty, notwithstanding the fact that it is not liable for negligence in the performance of such other governmental duty.

Defendant also contends that the verdict is excessive. The case has been tried twice. At the first trial, the jury returned a verdict for $7,500, and the trial court granted a new trial on the ground that it was excessive. At the second trial, the jury returned a verdict for $5,000. The trial court granted a new trial unless plaintiff stipulated to reduce the verdict to the sum of $3,500, but denied a new trial in case such stipulation were filed. Plaintiff filed the stipulation and reduced the verdict to the sum of $3,500. Under the circumstances we think this court would not be justified in interfering with the verdict as reduced.

Order affirmed.

KANSAS CITY, Respt.,
v.

R. M. PENGILLEY, Appt.

(— Mo. —, 199 S. W. 380.)

Imprisonment for debt — violation of ordinance.

A municipal corporation cannot, under a constitutional provision forbidding imprisonment for debt, provide for imprisonment of one who refuses to pay for use of a vehicle which he has hired to transport himself or his property.

Messrs. J. A. Harzfeld and Charles M. Blackmar also for respondent.

Blair, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal comes from the criminal court of Jackson county, wherein, on appeal from the municipal court of Kansas City, appellant was fined $5 for an alleged violation of a section of an ordinance of Kansas City, reading thus: "Section 1. That any person who shall hire a horse-drawn or power-propelled vehicle, whether carriage, buggy, wagon, automobile or taxicab, for the purpose of riding therein or transporting any goods, wares, or merchandise, and shall refuse to pay the agreed price, or the reasonable price therefor, or the rate therefor as fixed by any ordinance of Kansas City, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $1 nor more than $500."

The remainder of the ordinance prescribed rates and regulations for automobiles used for carrying passengers for hire. Commitment for failure to pay the fine is part of the judgment in this case.

This proceeding grew out of appellant's failure to pay $15.40 claimed for the use of an automobile in which he rode. Let it be assumed the amount was correct, and that appellant refused to pay. The principal question counsel discuss is whether the ordinance is valid when tested by the provision of § 16, art. 2, of the state Constitution, which forbids imprisonment for debt.

A fine assessed for the infraction of a valid city ordinance is not within the prohibition mentioned. St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 302, 303. Is this ordinance valid? It is true it gives the unpaid owner of the vehicle no recovery under it; yet it does make the mere failure to pay an offense punishable by imprisonment. The obligation L.R.A.1917B.

to pay arose out of a contract (Lemon v. Chanslor, 68 Mo. loc. cit. 353, 30 Am. Rep. 799), and is strictly within the meaning of the word "debt" as used in the constitutional provision forbidding imprisonment therefor. It cannot be admitted that the constitutional prohibition may be evaded by the device of declaring a simple breach of contract a crime unless it is to be conceded that city councils and the legislature are not restricted at all. Bailey v. Alabama, 210 U. S. loc. cit. 242, 55 L. ed. 201, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145. Upon this question the supreme court of Washington said: "Imprisonment for debt is abhorrent to the spirit of free government, and is not to be tolerated under the form of penal statutes." Re Milecke, 52 Wash. loc. cit. 315, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 259, 132 Am. St. Rep. 968, 100 Pac. 743.

The same principle was approved in State v. Paint Rock Coal & Coke Co. 92 Tenn. loc. cit. 83, 84, 36 Am. St. Rep. 68, 20 S. W. 490. In Lamar v. Prosser, 121 Ga. loc. cit. 153, 48 S. E. 977, the supreme court of Georgia, discussing the same proposition, said: "The general assembly of this state cannot, under the guise of a statute creating a criminal offense, imprison one who has failed to pay a debt."

In this case the ordinance did not require, nor did the evidence tend toward, proof of fraud in the procurement and use of the vehicle. It is hardly disputable that the chauffeur knew appellant had no money with him when accepted as a passenger. The ordinance constitutes an effort to do indirectly what the Constitution declares shall not be directly done, and is therefore invalid. State ex rel. Smith v. Neosho, 203 Mo. loc. cit. 72, 73, 101 S. W. 99.

It is contended the ordinance falls within the police power. "The police power cannot be made a cloak under which to overthrow or disregard constitutional rights." State v. Missouri P. R. Co. 242 Mo. loc. cit. 356, 147 S. W. 121. This is settled doctrine.

The case of Bray v. State, 140 Ala. 172, 37 So. 250, involved an ordinance punishing the failure to pay hack hire. While the court held the ordinance valid, it did not discuss the provision of the Alabama Constitution prohibiting imprisonment for debt, except to hold that "fines, forfeitures, mulcts," etc., were not debts within its meaning. It did declare the passage of the ordinance within the council's legislative power as a police regulation, but did not argue the matter, and cited as authority a case holding city councils had power to regulate markets and require certain businesses to be transacted therein. The views of that court upon the particular justification, in the police power, of the ordinance it was considering, are not given in detail in the opinion. The ordinance is not set out in full, and what it may have required, if anything, in respect of proof of fraud, does not appear. In these circumstances we are not inclined to consider it as an authority supporting the city's contention in this case.

It is urged the fact the taxicab company was a common carrier ought to induce a different conclusion. There is no direct proof supporting the fact assumed. The taxicab company is in no wise at the mercy of its patrons. It may require payment in advance if it so desires, and thus protect itself. Regulations may be imposed upon patrons of carriers and fines may be assessed for their violation, but such regulations must accord with applicable constitutional provisions. Further, the ordinance is not limited to common carriers, but applies, by its terms, to every horse-drawn or power-propelled vehicle hired for the conveyance of goods or passengers. Again, it is not confined to licensed vehicles, as was the ordinance in Bray v. State, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

Graves, Walker, Faris, and Revelle, JJ., concur. Woodson, Ch. J., concurs in the result.

FRANK J. KANE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, HENRY TITUS, PROSECUTOR.

(81 N. J. L. 594, 80 Atl. 453.)

Tax — automobiles — license — revenue.

1. The legislature may impose a license tax upon automobiles for revenue purposes. For other cases, see Licensee, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — interstate commerce — validity.

2. No unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce is effected by a statute imposing upon automobiles passing through the state, together with those owned and used in the state, a license tax for revenue purposes, the proceeds of which are to be applied to the upkeep of the highway. For other cases, see Commerce, IV. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — property — value.

3. That a license tax on automobiles is graduated according to the horse power of the machine does not constitute it a property tax so as to render it invalid because not imposed according to value.

For other cases, see License, II. e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

The imposition of license fees for revenue purposes upon nonresidents of the state of New Jersey passing through the state in a motor vehicle is violative of the Constitution of the United States, in that such nonresidents passing through the state are engaged in interstate commerce, and the imposition of license fees for revenue upon them is a burden on interstate commerce, and not within the power of the state to impose.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, a resident of the state of New York, while driving his automobile along the highways of this state, on his way from his place of residence to a town in the state of Pennsylvania, was arrested for violating the 15th and 16th sections of the automobile law of 1908 (Pamph. Laws 1908, p. 615), by not having registered his machine, or paid the fee required for doing so; and by not having filed with the secretary of state a duly executed instrument constituting that official his attorney, upon whom all original process in any action or legal proceeding brought against him, and arising out of the operation of his automobile within the state, might be served. His prosecution for this offense followed his arrest, and resulted in a conviction. Upon a review of that conviction by the supreme court, there was an affirmance; the court considering that the case was governed by its deliverance in State, Cleary, Prosecutor, v. Johnston, 79 N. J. L. 49, 74 Atl. 538. The plaintiff in error, by the present writ, attacks the legality of the original conviction, and of its affirmance.

The first contention made in his behalf is that the automobile law of 1908 is invalid, because the license fees exacted by it are not limited to the cost of registration and inspection, and the act is therefore intended as a revenue measure. In State, Cleary, Prosecutor, v. Johnston, supra, the proofs submitted were not considered by the court to be demonstrative that the statute was a revenue measure; the court, however, pointed out that if such was conceded to be its object, the law was nevertheless not invalid on that account, for the reason that the imposition of license fees for revenue purposes was clearly within the sovereign power of the state. We agree with counsel of the plaintiff in error that the proofs taken in the present case satisfactorily show that the present automobile law is a revenue measure, but hold, in accordance with the view expressed by the supreme court, and above adverted to, that in passing it the legislature was fully within the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. The former decisions of our courts, upon this subject are fully cited in the opinion in the Cleary Case, and a re-citation of them by us is unnecessary.

It is further contended by the plaintiff in error that, conceding the power of the legislature to impose license fees upon its own citizens for the purpose of raising revenue, the statute under consideration, because it imposes such fees upon nonresidents passing through the state, and engaged in interstate commerce, violates the commerce provision L.R.A.1917B.

of the Federal Constitution, and is therefore, to that extent, void; that plaintiff in error was so engaged at the time of his arrest; and that for this reason his conviction should be set aside.

We are willing to assume, in the discussion of this point, that the claim of the plaintiff in error that, at the time of his arrest, he was engaged in interstate commerce, is justified by the fact. This being so, the important question remains whether the act of 1908 is to any extent a regulation of commerce between the states, within the meaning of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. That it affects interstate commerce is true. But state laws may do this without being obnoxious to the constitutional provision appealed to. For example, a state may erect, or authorize the erection, of wharves along the banks of its navigable rivers which are used for commerce between the states, and charge, or authorize to be charged, wharfage fees for the privilege of receiving and landing thereon passengers and freight which come from other states, without infringing upon that provision. The imposition of such charges, although affecting interstate commerce, is nevertheless a legitimate exercise of state power. Parkersburg & O. River Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691, 27 L. ed. 584, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 732. So, too, a state may construct locks in such rivers, in order to improve the navigation thereof, and legally charge reasonable tolls to persons using such locks while engaged in interstate commerce. Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. ed. 487, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 313. It may construct, or authorize to be constructed, in such waters, booms for the purpose of increasing the facility with which the business of floating and gathering logs may be conducted thereon, and lawfully charge, or authorize to be charged, reasonable sums for the use of such booms in the floating of logs from a point within the state to a point outside thereon, or vice versa. Lindsay & P. Co. v. Mullen, 176 U. S. 126, 44 L. ed. 400, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325. A state may do these things because, having expended moneys, either itself or by the agencies created by it, in increasing the facility with which commerce, either interstate or intrastate, may be carried on, it is entitled to charge a fair remuneration for the outlay made by it, and for the maintenance of the public work which it has constructed.

A very ordinary example of the exercise of this power is the construction of public roads known as "turnpikes" by agencies created by the state, for the use of which tolls are permitted to be charged to persons using the same. Such public roads are open to the use of every person desiring to travel upon them upon payment of the tolls authorized to be charged, but it has never been suggested, so far as we are aware (and certainly any such suggestion would be without merit), that a team and wagon bringing merchandise from another state is entitled to the use of these improved highways, without the payment of the required toll, because engaged in interstate commerce.

Although, ordinarily, turnpikes are built and owned by corporations created by the state, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining them, what the state may do indirectly through such agencies it may do directly; that is, it may itself lay out and construct such improved public roads, and charge reasonable tolls to all persons using the same, without regard to the character of the business for which they are being used. And this is practically what New Jersey is now doing. It has spent millions of dollars in improving the roads of the state, and is yearly expending hundreds of thousands more in their extension and maintenance. It has found that the use of these roads by heavy and swiftly moving automobiles results in their rapid deterioration, and increases largely the annual expense of maintaining them in proper condition. It considers, and rightly, we think, that a user of its roads, which is so abnormally destructive, should no longer be free, and by the law of 1908 it imposes upon all of these vehicles which are driven over its roads a charge for such user, for the purpose of raising revenue to be applied to their upkeep. Instead of charging mileage fee, or toll, to be regulated by the distance traveled, it has seen fit to require the payment of a lump sum by the owners of such machines, for the privilege of using its roads: the charge being regulated by the horse power shown, viz., automobiles of 10 horse power or less are charged $3, those between 10 and 30 horse power $5, and those of more than 30 horse power $10. The payment of these fees is required, alike by residents and nonresidents, for machines used for pleasure or for commerce. No discrimination whatever is made by the statute in favor of any person or any automobile. It is absolutely impartial in its operation. By paying the fee required, the owner of an automobile, whether a resident or nonresident, is entitled to use the same upon the roads of the state to the fullest extent he may desire.

The charging of an annual sum for the use of its highways by automobiles, instead of a mileage fee, is clearly a matter within the discretion of the state. No constitutional objection lies in the way of a legislative body prescribing any mode of measurement to determine the amount it will charge for the privilege it bestows. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593. The only limit upon its power is that the amount charged shall not be unreasonable; and there is no suggestion that such a condition is created by the present law. We conclude, therefore, that the contention of the plaintiff in error, that the Act of 1908 contravenes the Federal Constitution, is without substance.

It is further contended on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the imposition provided by the Act of 1908 is a property tax, and invalid because it is imposed without regard to the value of the property upon which it is laid. What we have already said disposes of this contention. The character of the imposition is not determined by the mode adopted in fixing its amount. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163. The imposition is a license or privilege tax charged in the nature of compensation for the damage done to the roads of the state by the driving of these machines over them, and is properly based, not upon the value of the machine, but upon the amount of destruction caused by it.

The other errors assigned and argued are fully discussed by the Supreme Court in its opinion in State, Cleary, Prosecutor, v. Johnston, and we are entirely content with the disposition there made of them.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, December 4, 1916, in 242 U. S. 160, 61 L. ed. —, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a nonsuit granted by the Superior Court for Rowan County in an action brought to recover damages for depriving plaintiff of a legacy by spoliation of a will. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George W. Garland for appellant.

Mr. E. L. Gaither for appellees.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges that after the death of W. A. Bailey the defendants conspired to deprive the plaintiff and others of the benefits of his last will by removing from the paper writing to which the sheet of paper containing the alleged signature of the deceased was attached that part providing for the legacy to the plaintiff and others, and substituting other provisions therefor. The plaintiff contends that thereby a previous will has been admitted to probate. In the course of the proceeding the plaintiff asked for the appointment of a commissioner to take the examination of the defendants in the nature of a bill of discovery. The defendants demurred that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, and held that unless the will that had been proven in common form was attacked and set aside by caveat, the plaintiff could not maintain the cause of action set out in the complaint. This put an end to the plaintiff's further progress in the cause, and he took a nonsuit and appealed.

The plaintiff is not seeking to attack the will on record, nor to probate what he alleges was a subsequent will. He is not seeking to recover anything out of the estate, but is bringing an action of tort against the parties who, as she alleges, conspired and injured her by removing the clause of, and the signature to, what was a subsequent will by which she would have received a legacy. It is an action of spoliation by which she alleges the defendants have prevented her receiving the sum of money which was due her if they had not fraudulently altered and defaced the subsequent will. She alleges that she does not attempt to set up the second will, because the evidence accessible to her would not prove its entire contents. She prefers, therefore, to bring this action against the defendants for their wrongdoing in fraudulently destroying the part of the will which was beneficial to herself.

Though this action seems to be of the first impression in this state, and is doubtless a very unusual one, there is foundation and reason for the action upon well-settled principles of law, and we are not entirely without precedent. In Tucker v. Phipps, 3 Atk. 359, 26 Eng. Reprint, 1008, cited in Barnesly v. Powel, 1 Ves. Sr. 284, 27 Eng. Reprint, 1034, it was held that, the spoliation being clearly proven, the plaintiff could maintain his action without setting up the will by a probate. It was held that where a will is destroyed or concealed, while the general rule is to probate the alleged will by proof in the ecclesiastical court [which was there the court for probate wills], yet the legatee might bring his action for the damage sustained by spoliation and suppression.

In that case the spoliation was alleged to have been a destruction or concealment of the will by the executor. Such action against a stranger is even more appropriate than an independent action against the executor. Tucker v. Phipps is to be found in 26 Eng. Reprint, 1008. Another case very much in point is Barnesly v. Powel, 1 Ves. Sr. 284, 27 Eng. Reprint, 1034, in which Tucker v. Phipps is cited as authority, and the court also refers with approval to "a late case where the defendant burned a will, in which was a legacy to the plaintiff, so that it could not be proved in the ecclesiastical court (which cannot prove a will on loose parts of the contents of it), yet on evidence of there being such a will, and the defendant's destroying it, the court decreed the legacy to the plaintiff, as the defendant by his own iniquity had prevented the plaintiff from coming at it."

There may be other precedents, but the instances must have been rare. Even if there had been no precedent, it would seem that, upon the principle of justice that there is "no wrong without a remedy," the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action, if, as she alleges, the defendants conspired and destroyed the subsequent will in which the legacy was left her. If she cannot prove the destroyed will because unable to prove the entire contents thereof (Re Hedgepeth, 150 N. C. 245, 63 S. E. 1025), surely she is entitled to recover of the defendants for the wrong they have done her by the conspiracy and destruction of the will, and the measure of her damages will be the legacy of which she has been deprived. It may be very difficult for her to prove her allegations by legal evidence and satisfactory to a jury, but with that we have nothing to do. The only question presented to us is the ruling of the court below that the complaint does not state a cause of action; and in this we think the court below was mistaken.

As the action is not to set up the will, nor against the estate, but against the defendants individually for their tort, the action could be brought in the county where the plaintiff resides.

Reversed.

Annotation—Liability for mutilation or spoliation of will.

The decision in DULIN v. BAILEY, ante, 556, seems sound and reasonable. That an action of tort for damages will lie by one injured by the spoliation of a will has already been held in at least one instance prior to the reported case, the action, however, not having been brought until after the will had been correctly probated.

In Taylor v. Bennett (1885) 1 Ohio C. D. 57, 1 Ohio C. C. 95, the plaintiffs, after proving the will of their father, brought an action against one who had spoliated it by cutting out the names of the witnesses and other material parts, alleging that, by reason of such wrongful acts, the plaintiffs were compelled to employ counsel and institute legal proceedings in the probate court of the county, for the purpose of having the said will proved and admitted to record by said court, and that they were compelled to expend their time and money in and about the probate of the said will; and they recovered judgment.

Tucker v. Phipps (1746) 3 Atk. 360, 26 Eng. Reprint, 1008, cited in DULIN v. BAILEY, was a bill in equity, reciting that the defendant had destroyed or concealed a will of the plaintiff's father-in-law which gave the plaintiff's wife a legacy, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to an immediate decree for payment of the legacy, although the will had not been probated.

In this connection it is interesting to refer to two or three of the cases where relief was granted in equity.

Thus, in Woodruff v. Burton (1719; Eng.) referred to in the decision of the Master of the Rolls in Dalston v. Coatsworth (1721) 1 P. Wms. 734, 24 Eng. Reprint, 591,—“A devisee brought his bill against the heir, and it being made to appear that there was such a will as the plaintiff had suggested, and that the defendant had destroyed it, the Lord Chancellor Parker decreed the defendant to convey the premises to the plaintiff in fee, and to deliver up the possession, which (his Honour said) seemed to him to be the most effectual and reasonable decree.”

A similar decision was made in Williams v. Williams (1863) 33 Beav. 306, 55 Eng. Reprint, 385, 3 New Reports, 100, 9 Jur. N. S. 1267, 9 L. T. N. S. 566, 12 Week. Rep. 140. So, where the heir suppressed the will against the sole devisee and legatee, equity decreed that the estate would be held against him till he produced the will. Hampden v. Hampden (1709) 3 Bro. P. C. 550, 1 Eng. Reprint, 1492.

It may be noted that the quotation in DULIN v. BAILEY, from Barnesly v. Powell (1749) 1 Ves. Sr. 284, 27 Eng. Reprint, 1034, is from the plaintiff's argument, and not from the court's opinion.

Of interest by way of analogy is the case of Mitchell v. Langley, L.R.A. 1916C, 1134, holding that one named as a beneficiary in a certificate issued by a benefit society, though not having such a vested interest as to prevent the member from changing beneficiaries, had such an interest as would sustain an action against a third person who, by false and malicious defamation of the beneficiary, fraudulently induced the member to change beneficiaries; and see comment in footnote to that case.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due for labor and material furnished in the construction of a public improvement. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. E. C. Stanard, J. H. Wahl, and C. H. Ennis, for plaintiff in error:

One who simply rents a contractor a machine with which to do excavating on public works does not come within the purview of the phrase of the bond, "labor and material furnished in the construction of said extension."

Galbraith, C., filed the following opinion:

This cause was decided on demurrer in the court below. It was held that a cause of action was stated by the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The plaintiff brought action against the Southern Surety Company and Nick Peay, upon a bond given in pursuance to §§ 3881 and tional Surety Co. v. United States, L.R.A. 1917A, 336. Various annotations on allied questions are cited in the note last referred to.

3882, Rev. Laws 1910. The allegations of the petition, so far as important to be noticed here, are: That the Southern Surety Company does a general bonding business throughout the state of Oklahoma. That Nick Peay, doing business under the name of Nick Peay Construction Company, as principal, and the Southern Surety Company, as surety, executed and filed with the clerk of the district court of McIntosh county a certain bond in writing, a copy of which is attached as "Exhibit A." That said bond was for the sum of $63,000 and recited that whereas the Nick Peay Construction Company had entered into a written contract with the city of Eufaula, Oklahoma, for the construction of a sanitary sewer system and the further extension of the waterworks system, now, therefore, "if the said principal shall well and truly pay all indebtedness incurred for any and all labor and material furnished in the construction of said extension in the performance of said contract, then this obligation to be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect." That prior to making and filing the bond the plaintiff entered into a certain contract in writing with the defendant Nick Peay, conditioned for supplying and furnishing certain labor and material to be used in the execution of the terms of said contract of the said Nick Peay with the city of Eufaula. A copy of said contract was attached to the petition, and further alleged: "That the said Nick Peay, doing business as the Nick Peay Construction Company, became indebted to and incurred certain indebtedness with the plaintiff for work and material furnished by plaintiff to said Nick Peay in the construction of said sewer system and extension provided for and under the terms of the contract marked 'Exhibit C,' and to cover which indebtedness the said bond marked 'Exhibit —' was made and filed by the defendants, and each of them. That the labor and material furnished by plaintiff to said defendant aforesaid was under and by virtue of the said subcontract hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit B.' That said labor and material was furnished and the indebtedness incurred therefor between the 25th day of January, 1913, and June 12, 1913, and was of the contract price and value of $3,394.51, and on which amount the plaintiff received payment of $850, leaving a balance due and unpaid of $2,544.51 for such labor and material so furnished and indebtedness incurred as aforesaid, and for which said surety bond was given by said defendants." And that demand for the payment of the balance due on said account for labor and material had been made and payment refused, and that said action was L.R.A.1917B.

brought within six months, as provided by statute, and attached a statement of the account for labor and material, as claimed, as "Exhibit B," and prayed for judgment in the amount of the account.

The statement of the account attached to the petition was as follows:

The pertinent parts of the contract between plaintiff and Nick Peay, under which plaintiff's claim arose, are as follows:

"Clause 1. That said first party (plaintiff) hereby agrees to furnish said second party (the construction company) with two of its trenching machines for a minimum term of sixty working days, without respect to delays, Sundays and legal holidays excepted. . . .

"Clause 3. Said first party hereby agrees to furnish one operator who shall be in full charge of said machine during such time as second party desires to operate said machine, and shall also have the right to employ an engineer and fireman to operate the engine and do firing. Said operator, engineer, and fireman to be the employees of and to be paid by the second party.

"Clause 5. Said second party shall pay to said first party a minimum rental of $30 for No. 43 and $20 for No. 58 per day . . . and in addition to pay five (5) cents per cubic yard for all excavation in trenches less than eight (8) feet in depth, and ten (10) cents per cubic yard for all excavation in trenches (8) feet or more in depth."

The surety company filed a general demurrer to the petition which was by the court overruled, and the surety company, refusing to amend, but electing to stand upon its demurrer, refused to plead further, and the court rendered judgment against it for the amount claimed in plaintiff's petition. To review that judgment an appeal has been duly perfected to this court.

The error assigned is the order of the court overruling the demurrer to the petition. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that, inasmuch as it appeared from the face of the petition that the account sued upon was not for "labor and material" furnished in connection with the execution of the contract for a public improvement, but arose out of a claim for rentals for trenching machines furnished by the plaintiff to the contractor, this indebtedness is not within the condition of the bond, and therefore the petition failed to state a liability against the surety company. It is contended on behalf of the defendant in error that inasmuch as the petition alleged that the account was for "labor and material furnished the contractor in the execution of the public improvement," and that the demurrer admitted the truth of these allegations, therefore the petition stated an indebtedness within the conditions of the bond, and the court was therefore right in overruling the demurrer.

It may be conceded that, so far as the allegations of the petition are concerned, considered alone, an indebtedness within the terms of the bond is declared upon, since the claim is alleged to be due for labor and material furnished the contractor in the execution of his contract; but, when taken in connection with the exhibits attached to the petition, it clearly appears that the indebtedness sued upon was for the rentals for the trenching machines that the plaintiff furnished the contractor. However, the rule is that, in construing the petition upon a demurrer, the exhibits attached thereto must be considered in connection with the allegations thereof. In the case of Whiteacre v. Nichols, 17 Okla. 387, 87 Pac. 865, it is said: "On demurrer to a petition, as defective, in that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the petition should be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties; and a demurrer will only be sustained where the petition presents defects so substantial and fatal as to authorize the court to say that, taking all the facts to be admitted, they furnish no cause of action whatever."

In Calman v. Kreipke, 40 Okla. 516, 139 Pac. 698, the Nichols Case, supra, is approved, and the first paragraph of the syllabus of that case reads: "In an action on account, where the petition upon its face states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, but certain exhibits attached thereto suggest a doubt as to whether the defendant, in making the purchase, acted in a representative capacity, or as an individual, a general demurrer thereto should be overruled."

Under the rule announced in these decisions, the allegations of the petition in the instant case must be construed in connection with the exhibits attached thereto. So construed, it clearly appears that the claim in suit is due entirely for rentals on machines furnished by the Excavator Company to the contractor. This presents the question squarely whether or not a claim for rentals due for a machine, independent of any claim for labor for operating it, can properly be said to be "labor and material furnished" within the condition of the bond in suit. Upon the answer returned to this question depends the correctness of the ruling of the trial court. If the claim for rentals were either labor or material, then the ruling of the trial court was right; but, if such claim cannot be held to be either labor or material, then the ruling was wrong.

We are reminded at the outset of this investigation that the industry of counsel has not discovered a single decision holding that rentals for machines furnished a contractor engaged in construction work were either labor or material within the terms of a statute permitting liens against improvements for labor and material furnished therefor, or that such a claim is within the protection of a bond required of a public contractor, conditioned that all labor and material furnished shall be paid for by him. It seems that this question is one of first impression in this jurisdiction, although analogous questions have been adjudicated by the courts of other states having a similar statute to our own.

Section 3881, Rev. Laws 1910, requires any public officer, before entering into a contract for any public works costing to exceed $100, to take from the contractor a sufficient bond, payable to the state of Oklahoma, conditioned that the contractor "shall pay all indebtedness incurred for labor or material furnished in the construction of said public building or in making said public improvements."

In the state of Washington the statute requiring a public contractor to give bond was broader than the statute in this state, inasmuch as it required the condition of the bond to be that the contractor "shall pay all laborers, mechanics, subcontractors and materialmen and all persons who shall supply said principal or subcontractors with provisions and supplies for the carrying on of said work, all just debts, dues and demands incurred in the performance of said work."

Hurley-Mason Co. v. American Bonding Co. 79 Wash. 564, 140 Pac. 575, was an action for the rental value of a pump and hoist derrick furnished to the contractor constructing a waterworks system for a city in the state of Washington. The action was against the contractor and the surety company on a bond conditioned as provided in the statute above quoted. The court held that this claim for rentals was "supplies" and within the condition of the bond, and that the surety company was liable therefor. The court said in the course of its opinion: "It must be conceded that this approaches very close to the line between secured and unsecured items under this statute and bonds given in pursuance thereof."

It will be observed that the conditions of the bond given under the statute of the state of Washington were broader than the conditions of the bond in suit in the instant case. It cannot be claimed that this decision is an authority justifying the holding that the claim for rentals involved in the instant case was either labor or material within the conditions of the bond in suit.

In the state of Michigan there was a statute similar to § 3881 of our Rev. Laws 1910. The case of Alpena ex rel. Besser v. Title Guaranty & S. Co. 159 Mich. 329, 123 N. W. 1126, was an action for labor and material furnished in repair work performed on the pumps and machines used in connection with a waterworks contract. The question presented was whether or not this claim was within the conditions of the bond requiring the payment of labor and material furnished. The court held that it was not, and in part said: "The provision of the bond upon which the claim of the use plaintiff is based is the promise of the defendant to save harmless the city of Alpena, etc., from unpaid claims for 'labor and materials furnished under the contract.' To give to this provision the construction claimed for it by the plaintiff would render the surety liable, not only for the cost of small and incidental repairs to the machinery and plant used in construction (which is the extent of the use plaintiff's claim in the case at bar), but also for all large changes and improvements in equipment, more or less permanent in character, and perhaps long surviving in usefulness the completion of the contract upon which the equipment was being used at the time the repairs were made. And by a parity of reasoning it might even be said that the surety became responsible for the original cost of the plant, because it was purchased by the contractor, to be used upon the contract. We are of opinion that this contention is not tenable, but, on the contrary, think that the term 'labor and materials, furnished under the contract,' means such labor and materials as are necessary to construct the work in accordance with the contract. This view is supported by reason and authority."

Kansas City use of Kansas City Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Youmans, 213 Mo. 151, 112 S. W. 225, was an action against the surety on a bond having a similar condition as that in the instant case, and the court, in holding that a claim for explosives sold to a contractor and used in the construction of the waterworks system was within the protection of the bond, and that steam shovels, engines, boilers, shovels, crowbars, and other like tools were not within its provisions, in part said: "A steam shovel, an engine, and boiler, picks, shovels, crowbars, and the like, are tools and appliances, which, while used in the doing of the work, survive its performance and remain the property of their owner. Not so, however, with materials that are used up in the performance of the work, and are therefore invisible except as they survive in tangible results. We think that explosives, when used as substitutes for other recognized 'materials,' are covered by the same principle. They enter into and form a part of the permanent structure quite as much as the earth, rails, ties, culverts, and bridges that we can see and feel."

McAuliffe v. Jorgenson, 107 Wis. 132, 82 N. W. 706, was an action seeking to establish a lien for rentals due for the use of a well-boring machine used by the contractor in drilling a well. The court, in denying the claim, in part said: The "plaintiff's right to a lien is based upon the fact that he hired his well-boring machine to . . . who had the contract to bore the well. . . . Under no permissible theory can it be said the plaintiff has furnished any 'material' that entered into or became a component part of the well. Whatever right he has, if any, arises from the use of his machine. When he hired it to . . . (the contractor) to all intents and purposes it became the latter's machine, the same as if he had purchased it outright. The plaintiff did no manual labor, either by himself or his servants, toward the construction of the well. The machine was used by . . . (the contractor) as though it was his own. For its use in connection with his own labors he would have been entitled to a lien; not for the use of the machine alone, but because, with his labors in the use and operation of the machine, the well was drilled."

In Wood C. & Co. v. El Dorado Lumber Co. 153 Cal. 230, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 585, 126 Am. St. Rep. 80, 94 Pac. 877, 15 Ann. Cas. 382, it was held by the supreme court of California: "One who merely rents horses and harness to the contractor, to be used in the prosecution of railroad construction, does not bestow labor on the road within the meaning of a statute giving a lien to one so doing.

In Potter Mfg. Co. v. A. B. Meyer & Co. 171 Ind. 513, 131 Am. St. Rep. 267, 86 N. E. 837, the supreme court of Indiana, in denying a lien claimed for the rental value of a trenching machine, under a statute giving lien for machinery furnished for the construction of public improvements, in part said: "A lien is authorized in favor of a laborer to the extent of the value of the work done by him. This trench machine owned by appellant did not work automatically, but was operated by men in the employ and under direction of the lessee of the machine, J. J. Smith & Company. There could be no question that the contractor, J. J. Smith & Company, might have acquired a lien to the extent of the value of the work done . . . by this labor-saving machine. Appellant, however, did not perform . . . any labor upon the structure to be erected. Its claim is not for the value of work actually done, but compensation at an agreed price for a specified time, as the rental value of the machine, without regard to whether it was idle or in use upon this work. But, waiving any technical questions as to the theory of the cross complaint, and assuming that, if the evidence so warranted, appellant might recover thereon to the extent of the value of work done by it, we are clearly of opinion that appellant is not shown to have performed any work, and, as the mere lessor of this machine, cannot be regarded as one performing labor within the meaning of the statute under consideration."

United States use of Rockland Lake Trap Rock Co. v. Conkling, 68 C. C. A. 220, 135 Fed. 508, was an action to recover a claim for per diem charged for a certain scow let to the contractor engaged in public works, against the surety and his bondsmen on a bond given under the Federal statute, conditioned for the payment of all labor and material furnished, on the ground that the rental for this scow was labor and material supplied in the prosecution of said work. The court, denying the claim, held that it was not within the conditions of the bond.

In United States use of Hill v. American Surety Co. 200 U. S. 197, 50 L. ed. 437, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 166, it was admitted that the claimant had furnished labor on a public improvement for which he had not been paid, but it was contended that he had furnished this labor to the subcontractor, and that the liability on the bond required by the Federal statutes from a contractor on public works extended only to claims for labor and material furnished to the contractor. The court said, in effect, that the object of requiring the bond under the law was to make sure that labor and material entering into public improvements for the Federal government should be paid for, and that, while the literal terms of the obligation of the bond only covered labor and material furnished to the contractor, still the labor and material sued for in that case entered into the public structure and were within the spirit and therefore within the protection of the bond. This case, however, does not hold, and is not an authority for the contention, that a claim for rentals on a machine furnished to the contractor, used upon public works, was either labor or material within the protection of the obligation of such a bond as that in suit.

Under the foregoing authorities, and many others cited and discussed in those decisions, we are constrained to the view that only "a strong arm" construction of the statutes would bring the claim involved in this suit within the protection of the bond. It cannot be said that the excavator company furnished either labor or material for the public works, or that it sustained any contract relation to such public works. It merely furnished two machines to the contractor that he employed in the construction of this public work. It is true that the excavator company furnished the skilled operator and retained the right in its contract to furnish an engineer and fireman, but it expressly stipulated that such employees should be the employees of the contractor, and should be paid for by him. It therefore performed no labor in connection with the operation of the machine. Its claim is only for a stipulated rental for the use of the machine. Such a claim was not within the letter or spirit of the bond and was not protected thereby. The court was therefore in error in overruling the demurrer to the petition, on account of which the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to vacate the order overruling the demurrer, and to enter an order sustaining the same, and for such further proceedings as may be necessary, not inconsistent with this opinion.

v.
NEVADA-CALIFORNIA-OREGON RAIL-WAY, Appt.

(81 Or. 673, 160 Pac. 808.)

Pleading — enforcement of contract — undisclosed principal.

1. A complaint to enforce a contract on behalf of an undisclosed principal need not state that the contract was made through the agent.

For other cases, see Pleading, II. h, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — failure to transport live stock.

2. The damages for delay of a carrier in furnishing cars to transport live stock to a particular market are the loss in that market because of diminution of weight of the animals when they arrive below what it would have been had the contract been complied with, and not merely the depreciation at point of shipment.

For other cases, see Damages, III. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(November 14, 1916.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lake County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure of defendant to furnish cars for the transportation of plaintiff's live stock. Affirmed.

Statement by Burnett, J.:

The amended complaint contains four separate causes of action, the gravamen of each of which is that the plaintiff in one instance and his assignors in the others contracted with the defendant for the latter to furnish cars at a station on its railroad in which to ship live stock for the San Francisco market; but that, in violation of the agreement, the defendant failed to supply the cars until a later date, in consequence of which delay the stock to be transported depreciated in weight and quality, to the damage of the shipper. The defense against each count of the amended complaint consists in general denials, and the affirmative charge, in substance, that if the animals declined in condition, it was on account of the negligence of the person in charge failing to give them sufficient food and proper care while in the stockyards of the defendant awaiting shipment. The new matter of the answer is denied by the reply. The jury rendered a verdict favorable to the plaintiff, and from the consequent judgment the defendant appeals.

Messrs. James Glynn and L. F. Conn, for appellant:

The complaint was entirely insufficient to warrant the admission of any testimony in behalf of the plaintiff, in regard to the contract to furnish cars, there being no allegation which would authorize him or J. G. Johnson to sue on the contract made by plaintiff's agent.

Burnett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Several assignments of error are predicated upon the fact that the court allowed testimony to the effect that the agreement with the defendant was made in each instance by an agent of the plaintiff who did not disclose his principal, the contention being that under the averment that the plaintiff entered into the contract, it is not admissible to show that the compact was really made between the defendant and an agent of the plaintiff. The defendant's argument is that, in order for the undisclosed principal to recover on such a stipulation, it would be necessary to aver that the contract was made through an agent. This court has held to the contrary in Kitchen v. Holmes, 42 Or. 252, 70 Pac. 830, and Smith Meat Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 59 Or. 206, 117 Pac. 303. In other words, if the plaintiff alleges that he himself made the contract, it is permissible to prove that he did this by an agent. Cases like Baker v. Eglin, 11 Or. 333, 8 Pac. 280, to the effect that where A makes a contract with B for the benefit of C, the latter may bring an action upon it, are not applicable in this instance. There the real party in interest was avowedly C, and he was entitled to litigate in his own name. In the present juncture if in fact the agreement was made by the agent, acting for his principal, the latter is the real party in interest, and the proper one to conduct the litigation.

Another class of errors assigned relates to the measure of damages. The defendant contends that it is the difference between the value of the stock at the point of shipment when offered for transportation and the reasonable worth of the same when the cars were actually furnished at the same place; while the plaintiff urges that it is the difference between what would have been the market value at the place of destination and the real worth of the stock at the time they arrived there. In brief, the defendant contends that the damages should be measured by conditions at the point of shipment, while the plaintiff maintains that they should be governed by the circumstances at the place of destination.

We note that the only cause of complaint is the delay in furnishing the cars where the stock was to be loaded, as the parties had previously agreed upon. No charge is made that the animals were neglected or ill treated enroute to San Francisco. We observe, also, that it is alleged, and the evidence tended to show, that the cars were ordered for the transportation of the stock to the San Francisco market. The general rule is that damages may be predicated with reference to all that was in the reasonable contemplation of the parties in the performance of the agreement. It may be conceded that if the defendant had no knowledge or notice of the purpose for which the cars were to be used, or of the place to which the animals were to be forwarded, or of the purpose for which they were to be sent there, the damages ought to be computed by the rule which the defendant suggests.

But here it is alleged and the evidence shows that it was within the contemplation of both parties that the cars were to be used to transport the stock to the San Francisco market: that is to say, they were to be taken there for sale. What injury, then, naturally flows from the neglect of the defendant to carry out its agreement? The delay where the shipment originated caused a depreciation in the marketable condition of the animals, had its effect on their condition at their destination, and rendered them less valuable there. As stated in Chat- tanooga Southern R. Co. v. Thompson, 133 Ga. 127, 131, 65 S. E. 285, 287, cited by the defendant: "Ordinarily, in a suit by a shipper against a carrier, in case of injury to or loss of the property by the carrier's fault, the carrier is required to make compensation on the basis of the value at the place of destination."

In that case the court refused to apply that rule because in the agreement to furnish the cars there was no stipulation about any destination for the goods to be shipped in them. The court there properly decided that the damages should be computed as at the place of shipment, because there was no destination or particular market within the contemplation of the parties. In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Musick, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 591, 80 S. W. 673, noted in the defendant's brief, the trial court charged the jury thus: "If you find for plaintiff, the measure of damages will be the difference, if any, between the market value of the cattle when they should have arrived at their destination and when they did arrive, and also such damages, if any, as said cattle may have sustained by the unreasonable and negligent delay on the part of the defendant in furnishing cars and shipping said cattle after said cattle had been received by defendant for shipment."

The court of civil appeals of Texas held this erroneous because it authorized double damages. In other words, the two clauses of the charge were in legal effect duplicates, as the precedent is applied to the instant contention. Where there is a market value of property intended for sale, that is the standard by which depreciation of it must be measured, and that was the ultimate question to be determined in that case, no matter what was the cause of the decline. So here, the parties had in view the accomplishment of a certain plan by the plaintiff; namely, the delivery of sheep and lambs in San Francisco for market purposes. That which rendered them less valuable for that purpose is what would cause damage, and hence it was proper to instruct the jury to consider how much less they were worth than the market value by reason of the damage caused by the defendant's delay. The instruction of the court on that subject here follows: "The damage in each cause of action in this case will be determined without any regard to rise or fall in the sheep or lamb market in San Francisco during the delay in furnishing cars alleged in each cause of action in the complaint, if you find there was any such delay, and without regard to any delay en route between the place where each shipment originated and its destination. The measure of damages, if any you find, will therefore be the difference between the reasonable market value of the live stock described in each cause of action set forth in the complaint at the time and in the condition such stock would have arrived in San Francisco if the Nevada-California-Oregon Railway had furnished cars according to the contract alleged in each cause of action, if you find such contract to have been made, and the decreased reasonable market value, if you find there was any decrease, at the time and in the condition said live stock did arrive in San Francisco, taking into consideration only loss in weight and quality, if any, of the lambs or sheep, directly due to the delay, if any, of the defendant railroad in furnishing cars in which to move said stock, and without regard to any fluctuation in the price of lambs or sheep in the San Francisco market, or delay, if there was any, after the live stock was loaded on the cars. In other words, the damage, if any, is the loss in reasonable market value due solely to loss in weight or deterioration in quality of the lambs and sheep because of delay, if any, on the part of the defendant in furnishing cars, if you find defendant agreed to furnish cars as alleged. If you find plaintiff is entitled to recover damages from defendant, you will include in your verdict the reasonable value of any hay or feed necessarily fed to said live stock, and the reasonable value, if any, of necessary care and attention bestowed upon said live stock during the delay, if any you find, in providing cars for shipment, but in no event can you find for plaintiff damages in excess of the sum prayed for."

The trial judge very carefully excluded from the consideration of the jury anything about fluctuations in the price of the stock, and limited the jurors solely to the consideration of loss in weight or deterioration in quality of the stock, caused by the delay of the defendant in furnishing the cars as agreed. Other cases applicable are McManus v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 156 Iowa, 359, 136 N. W. 769; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Nicholson, 61 Tex. 491; Newport News & M. Valley R. Co. v. Mercer, 96 Ky. 475, 29 S. W. 301; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 37 L. ed. 292, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444.

The following precedents cited by the defendant are distinguishable: Richey & G. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 110 Minn. 347, 125 N. W. 897, was where no place of destination was mentioned, and it was held that the damages must be governed by conditions at the place of shipment. In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hume Bros. 87 Tex. 211, 27 S. W. 110, it was held that if the shipment of stock is not made for a certain market, but for pasturage only at the point of destination, the damage is referable to the decline in intrinsic rather than market value of the chattels, caused by the delay. In other words, the element of market conditions was not within the contemplation of the parties. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Thompson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 44 S. W. 8, was also a case where stock was shipped to pasture, and not to market. Dawson v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. 188 Mo. App. 365, 122 S. W. 335, was an instance where the plaintiff shipped two carloads of cattle from Trindle, Missouri, to Chicago. The train was delayed in arrival. The trial court instructed the jury that the defendant was liable: (1) For any loss to plaintiff occasioned by decline in the market at Chicago between the time plaintiff's cattle should have arrived and the time they did arrive; (2) for any shrinkage in the weight of the cattle over and above what was ordinary and usual in such cases; (3) for any loss to plaintiff occasioned by the stale appearance of the cattle, caused by the delay. The Kansas City court of appeals held that this was a correct statement of the law, but that as to the first and third elements there was no proof, and consequently reversed the case; but it will be observed that it expressly recognized as an element of damages the shrinkage in the weight of the cattle caused by the delay of the carrier. Southern Kansas R. Co. v. O'Loughlin Land & Cattle Co. 60 Tex. Civ. App. 91, 127 S. W. 568, was a case where the transportation company refused to deliver the cars for so long a time that the owner was compelled to sell the goods at the place of shipment. Under those circumstances, there being no transportation whatever, the court held that the measure of damages was the difference between the market value at the destination and the same value at the shipping point, less freight. There the feature of the stock arriving at the market was not open for consideration, because it was utterly absent.

In the present juncture, if nothing else were shown, we might well say that the failure to furnish cars at the appointed time worked out its full hurt at the point of shipment; that it accomplished there all it could in depreciation of the intrinsic worth of the animals; that it could have no subsequent effect upon them; and that, hence, the damage must be assessed according to their lessened value where they were delivered to the carrier. This, however, leaves out of view the feature that cars were to be furnished to carry the sheep to a specified market; not, indeed, to meet a certain price prevalent there on a particular day, but still to be sold there. That was the end to be attained, and it was known to the defendant. It contracted accordingly. Any shortcoming of the carrier, therefore, alleged and established, which operated to impair the plaintiff's fruition of the purpose taken into account by both parties to the agreement, constitutes ground for damage. The remedy ought to correspond in scope with the previously known plan which the defendant disarranged by its failure to co-operate as it promised.

Here we have within the contemplation of the parties the purpose of making the shipment to the San Francisco market. We have not only the delay of the defendant to supply the cars for that purpose, but we also have present the fact that, later on, the stock was actually transported to the destination. The measure of damage naturally flowing from these circumstances is the difference between the value of such stock in the condition in which they would have arrived at San Francisco if the cars had been furnished promptly, as agreed, and their actual value in the condition in which they did arrive. The other errors complained of either were not assigned, or were not presented in the brief; hence they must be considered as waived.

The judgment is affirmed.

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Criminal Court for Pickett County, dismissing his petition for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his discharge from custody to which he had been committed upon conviction of carrying a pistol. Remanded for relator's discharge upon payment of costs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. D. White and J. L. McDonald for appellants.

Mr. W. H. Swiggart, Jr., Assistant Attorney General, for appellee.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

J. W. Barnes was indicted on a charge of carrying a pistol at the February, 1914, term of the criminal court of Pickett county. He was tried at the October, 1914, term of that court, fined $50, and a jail sentence also imposed upon him. He appealed in error to the December, 1914, term of this court.

Pending the hearing of his case in this court, he was pardoned by the governor, December 22, 1914. His case was heard here January 11, 1915, and the judgment below, with a slight correction, was affirmed, and the case remanded for execution of said judgment.

Prior to the hearing in this court, Barnes undertook to dismiss his appeal in error, which he was not allowed to do, no explanation of this motion being made to the court, and the attorney general opposing the motion in order to have the judgment corrected as before noted.

The pardon that had been granted to Barnes was not called to the attention of this court in any manner on his former appeal. Upon the remand, Barnes pleaded his pardon in the trial court, but that court was of opinion the pardon was ineffective, and ordered Barnes into custody to serve his sentence and to secure the payment of the fine and costs previously adjudged against him. From the last order, the court refused an appeal, and this petition for habeas corpus was then filed. The petition was dismissed, and the petitioner gave bond and appealed.

The principal question is upon the validity of the pardon issued under such circumstances.

The Constitution of Tennessee provides that the governor "shall have power to grant reprieves, and pardons, after conviction, except in cases of impeachment." Article 3, § 6.

The state insists that the pardon, issued pending appeal in error to this court, was not issued after conviction. The argument is that the appeal in error suspended the judgment against Barnes, that he did not stand convicted, and there was no conviction upon which a pardon might operate, pending the appeal.

The contrary contention is that the verdict of the jury against Barnes was a conviction; that he was convicted after verdict, and a lawful object of executive clemency, regardless of judgment,—whether or not judgment had been entered, or, having been entered, had been suspended by appeal in error.

What meaning is to be attached to the word "conviction" in the section of the Constitution quoted?

In a dictum in Smith v. State, 6 Lea, 637, the court said: "A conviction implies not simply a verdict, but also a judgment (see Bouvier's Law Diet. title, 'Conviction'): though we believe it has not generally been held that a judgment should be actually entered before a pardon can be interposed."

In Parker v. State, 103 Tenn. 547, 53 S. W. 1092, there was a verdict of guilty and judgment entered thereupon, but defendant was released on bond pending motion for new trial. Prior to the filing of this motion, a pardon was granted, and the legality of the pardon was questioned on the ground that there had been no final judgment. We quote from the opinion:

"For the defendant, it is insisted that the term 'conviction,' as here used, signifies the adjudication or determination by the jury of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and that after verdict and before judgment pronounced upon it a pardon may issue, but that in any event final judgment in this case passed upon the defendant after the verdict was returned by the jury, and hence the pardon could legally issue.

"The court is of opinion this contention is well made. The judgment of the court upon the verdict is in form a final one, without the necessity of any formal sentence. The conviction was one which did not require that a sentence of infamy be pronounced."

The learned justice delivering the opinion in the court in Parker v. State did not agree to the invalidity of the pardon. It does not distinctly appear what opinion the majority entertained as to the contention that conviction signified the determination of a defendant's guilt by the jury. The decision was apparently rested on the idea that final judgment had been entered on the verdict, which judgment had not been suspended.

In Smith v. State, supra, the court correctly declared the general rule to be that a judgment need not actually be entered before a pardon can be interposed. A conviction is held to accrue upon a verdict of guilty in all the cases of which we know, save Campion v. Gillan, 79 Neb. 364, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 865, 126 Am. St. Rep. 667, 112 N. W. 585, 16 Ann. Cas. 319.

The Campion Case was really decided on other points, before the question here involved was reached, and the latter expressions of the court do not appear to have been at all necessary.

A very learned and elaborate discussion of the meaning of the word "conviction," as used in the Massachusetts Constitution (chap. 2, § 1, art. 9), providing that "no charter of pardon granted by the governor, with advice of the council, before conviction, shall avail the party pleading the same," etc., was undertaken by Mr. Justice Gray in Com. v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 333, 12 Am. St. Rep. 699. He reviewed authorities in England, Massachusetts, and elsewhere, and showed very plainly that "the ordinary legal meaning of 'conviction' when used to designate a particular stage of a criminal prosecution triable by jury is the confession of the accused in open court, or the verdict returned against him by the jury, which ascertains and publishes the fact of his guilt; while 'judgment' or 'sentence' is the appropriate word to denote the action of the court, before which the trial is had, declaring the consequences to the convict of the fact thus ascertained." Com. v. Lockwood, supra.

It was accordingly held that a pardon granted after verdict of guilty and before sentence was valid.

The supreme court of North Carolina reached a like conclusion, where the Constitution authorized the governor to grant pardons "after conviction." That court referred to the fact that in England the King might issue a pardon at any time, and, pointing out the reason for the constitutional provision, said: "At common law the Crown exercised the power of pardon at any time. The consequence was that crimes were smothered. The facts were not brought to light. The person charged was not brought before the public and required to answer the charge, and, of course, the public were dissatisfied. But under our Constitution and statute, the person charged must be brought before the public in a public trial, and face his accusers, and all the facts must appear, and the jury must find him guilty, and the court must sentence him. If then he will ask for pardon, he cannot deceive the pardoning power. The public are in possession of the facts and can resist his application. Nor is the pardoning power any longer irresponsible to the public, because he has to report the facts and his reasons for exercising the power." State v. Alexander, 76 N. C. 231, 22 Am. Rep. 675.

In the North Carolina case the defendant appealed before pardon, and it was argued that the appeal vacated the sentence or judgment, and no conviction remained. The court, however, thought the sentence or judgment was not part of the conviction, and the vacation of the judgment by appeal did not vacate the conviction, the verdict of the jury. The conviction would not be annulled unless the supreme court found error on the record, and awarded a new trial and a venire de novo. It was said that "nothing can be a conviction but the verdict of a jury." State v. Alexander, supra.

In full accord with the Massachusetts and North Carolina cases are People v. Marsh, 125 Mich. 410, 51 L.R.A. 461, 84 Am. St. Rep. 584, 84 N. W. 472; Gilmore v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 639, 139 Am. St. Rep. 981, 108 Pac. 416.

Looking to our statutes and to our Constitution, we find the word "conviction," as there used, does not ordinarily include nor imply judgment or sentence, but has a meaning entirely separate and apart from judgment or sentence. In many of our statutes the term "conviction" is used to signify the jury's verdict of guilty, and as something precedent to, and distinct from, judgment or sentence.

Thus, Shannon's Code, § 5595, provides that persons shall be rendered incompetent as witnesses by "conviction and sentence" for various crimes enumerated.

The following statutes further illustrate the point:

"Upon conviction of the crimes of abusing a female child, arson and felonious burning.

... burglary, etc., . . . it shall be part of the judgment of the court that the defendant be infamous, and be disqualified to give evidence, or to exercise the elective franchise." Shannon's Code, § 7199.

"If the defendant has been convicted of two or more offenses before judgment on either, the judgment is that the imprisonment on one commence at the expiration of the imprisonment upon any other of the offenses." Shannon's Code, § 7201.

"Whenever a felon is convicted of stealing or feloniously taking or receiving [stolen] property, or defrauding another thereof, the jury shall ascertain the value of such property, if not previously restored to the owner, and the court shall, thereupon, order the restitution of the property, and, in case this cannot be done, that the party aggrieved recover the value assessed against the prisoner, for which execution may issue as in other cases." Shannon's Code, § 7208.

"The court may also, where any person is convicted of a capital offense, and the jury who convicted him state in their verdict that they are of opinion that there are mitigating circumstances in the case, commute the punishment from death to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary." Shannon's Code, § 7232.

"A conviction, judgment, and execution for any one offense, is no bar to a prosecution for any other public offense committed previously, not necessarily included in the offense for which the defendant was convicted." Shannon's Code, § 7250.

Illustrations might be multiplied, but the Constitution of 1870 itself shows what its framers understood the word "conviction" to mean. It is provided in the Constitution: "That elections shall be free and equal, and the right of suffrage, as herein-after declared, shall never be denied to any person entitled thereto, except upon a conviction by a jury of some infamous crime, previously ascertained and declared by law, and judgment thereon by a court of competent jurisdiction." Article 1, § 5.

Without further elaboration we are satisfied that, as used in article 3, § 6, of the Constitution, the word "conviction" does not imply judgment or sentence. A pardon granted after a verdict of guilty is "after conviction," is valid, and entitles a defendant to his discharge, irrespective of judgment. An appeal in error suspends the judgment, but does not affect the verdict, and the defendant stands convicted, unless this court finds error and awards a new trial and venire de novo.

It is said, however, by the attorney general, that Barnes failed to plead his pardon on his former appeal to this court, and in no way called the attention of the court thereto, and that he has accordingly waived the benefit thereof.

It is undoubtedly true that the court does not judicially notice a pardon. A pardon is an act of grace, the benefit of which may be accepted or rejected by the convict. It is said to be like a deed, in that delivery is essential, and delivery is not complete without acceptance. If rejected, the court is without power to force the acceptance of executive clemency, and the court can neither know of the grant of a pardon nor presume its acceptance unless the facts are brought before it by motion, plea, or otherwise. So, usually, if one in possession of a pardon fails to plead it, and puts himself upon his trial, he has waived the advantage of such pardon. United States v. Wilson, 7 Pet. 150, 8 L. ed. 640; People v. Marsh, 125 Mich. 410, 51 L.R.A. 461, 84 Am. St. Rep. 584, 84 N. W. 472; 4 Bl. Com. 402.

Barnes, however, did not willingly go to trial in this court on the appeal in error from judgment against him. He undertook to dismiss his appeal, but permission to do this was denied him, as heretofore stated. There was no investigation and no trial of his case here on its merits, and could not have been, for there was no bill of exceptions. A slight modification was made in the judgment below, technical in character, upon motion of the attorney general, and the said judgment affirmed for want of bill of exceptions.

While it would have been proper practice for the pardon to have been pleaded here, still the circumstances were unusual and without precedent in our books, and we are not inclined to hold that Barnes lost the benefit of his pardon by his failure to call it to the attention of this court. He manifested no disposition to experiment with the court or trifle with its jurisdiction, but endeavored to dismiss his appeal. He did not put himself on trial here. There was only a formal affirmance of the judgment against him. He did promptly exhibit and interpose his pardon, in the court below, when the case was remanded for execution of sentence. Such delay, under such circumstances, should be attributed rather to the novelty of the situation and lack of announced rules of practice in this jurisdiction than to motives that would hazard the efficacy of the pardon.

The pardon did not release Barnes from any of the costs in the criminal case. Spellings v. State, 99 Tenn. 201, 41 S. W. 444; Smith v. State, 6 Lea, 637.

This case will be remanded to the court below, where petitioner will be held to secure all the costs in the criminal case. Upon payment of such costs he will be discharged. The costs of the habeas corpus proceedings are taxed to Pickett county. Henderson v. Walker, 101 Tenn. 229, 47 S. W. 430.

Annotation—Effect of pardon granted after verdict and before sentence, or pending appeal.

Generally as to parole and pardon, see Indexes to L.R.A. Notes under the title "Criminal Law," subtitle, "Parole; pardon." L.R.A.1917B.

This note does not include the question of the necessity of bringing the pardon judicially before the court by plea, motion, or otherwise (see United States v. Wilson (1833) 7 Pet. (U. S.) 150, 8 L. ed. 640), nor does it include the question of the effect of pardon upon costs. Upon that question, see the notes to Fischel v. Mills, 15 L.R.A. 396, and Villines v. State, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 207.

"Conviction" as verdict, etc.

Where the constitutional power of pardon excludes pardon "before conviction," a pardon after verdict, but before judgment or sentence, is good (Com. v. Lockwood (1872) 109 Mass. 323, 12 Am. Rep. 699); and no question seems to have been raised to such course in Com. v. Mash (1844) 7 Met. (Mass.) 472.

On the same principle, where the constitutional power to the governor is to grant pardons "after conviction," he may pardon after verdict, though before sentence or judgment. State ex rel. Butler v. Moise (1896) 48 La. Ann. 109, 35 L.R.A. 701, 18 So. 943; People v. Marsh (1900) 125 Mich. 410, 51 L.R.A. 461, 84 Am. St. Rep. 584, 84 N. W. 472; Spafford v. Benzie Circuit Judge (1904) 136 Mich. 25, 98 N. W. 741; Ex parte Collins (1887) 94 Mo. 22, 6 S. W. 345 (obiter); Blair v. Com. (1874) 25 Gratt. (Va.) 850. The same was apparently taken for granted in State v. Fuller (1821) 1 McCord L. (S. C.) 178.

So, the fact that the Constitution places in the governor power to grant reprieves and pardons "after conviction" does not limit his authority to cases in which the court has pronounced judgment, so as to authorize conferring upon the court, prior to that time, jurisdiction to remit punishment by a suspension of sentence. Snodgrass v. State (1912) 67 Tex. Crim. Rep. 615, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1144, 150 S. W. 162.

In Com. v. Lockwood (Mass.) supra, and People v. Marsh (1900) 125 Mich. 410, 51 L.R.A. 461, 84 Am. St. Rep. 584, 84 N. W. 472, the pardon was granted before sentence, pending the hearing of the exceptions in the appellate court, and in Com. v. Mash (Mass.) supra, it was granted before sentence, but after the appellate court had overruled the exceptions.

— Contra.

The contrary was held in Campion v. Gillan (1907) 79 Neb. 364, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 865, 126 Am. St. Rep. 667, 112 N. W. 585, 16 Ann. Cas. 319, where, in holding that the governor could not pardon in a bastardy proceeding, it was also held that a verdict was not a conviction within the Nebraska constitutional provision, the court pointing out that "the L.R.A. 1917B.

governor is required to communicate to the legislature each case of pardon granted, 'stating the name of the convict, the crime of which he was convicted, the sentence and its date, and the date of the reprieve, commutation, or pardon.' This he could not do if there had been no judgment and sentence."

It may be observed that the fact that the governor is required to report the sentence is also true in North Carolina, where it is considered, as appears later in this note, that the governor may pardon pending an appeal, on the theory that the appeal annuls or vacates the judgment, but that, as the verdict remains, the pardon is "after conviction." And in view of the obiter holding in Ex parte Collins (1887) 94 Mo. 22, 6 S. W. 345, supra, it may be further noted that in Missouri the governor is also required to report the sentence.

Pardons pending appeal.

A pardon after sentence, pending appeal, is one after conviction. Cole v. State (1907) 84 Ark. 473, 106 S. W. 673; Gilmore v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 639, 139 Am. St. Rep. 981, 108 Pac. 416; Chapman v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 643, 108 Pac. 418; White v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 644, 108 Pac. 1135; State v. Alexander (1877) 76 N. C. 231, 22 Am. Rep. 675; State v. Teeter (1877) 76 N. C. 239; State v. Heaton (1877) 76 N. C. 240; State v. Heaton (1877) 76 N. C. 241; STATE EX REL BARNES v. GARRETT, ante, 567.

In Cole v. State (Ark.) supra, the court said: "It has been questioned whether, when a case is pending in an appellate court on appeal, the governor has a right, in advance of the final decision, to issue a pardon. An appeal to this court only suspends, and does not vacate, a judgment of conviction, and it cannot be said that the governor has not the power, if he sees fit to exercise it, to pardon a criminal while the case is pending a final determination in the supreme court. Authority for it may be found in State v. Alexander (1877) 76 N. C. 231, 22 Am. Rep. 675; State v. Carson (1872) 27 Ark. 469."

The North Carolina cases, supra, proceed on the theory that the appeal annuls or vacates the judgment.

As heretofore stated in the first part of this note, in Com. v. Lockwood (Mass.) and People v. Marsh (Mich.) supra, the pardon was granted before sentence, pending the hearing of the exceptions in the appellate court, and in

Com. v. Mash (Mass.) supra, it was granted before sentence, but after the appellate court had overruled the exceptions.

Effect.

Most of the cases on the effect of pardons with reference to the time when they were granted concern their effect upon costs, as to which see the aforesaid notes in 15 L.R.A. 396 and 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 207.

Where a defendant convicted of fornication and bastardy was pardoned before sentence, it was held that he could not be held for maintenance of the child. Com. v. Ahl (1862) 43 Pa. 53.

It was held in North Carolina that an appeal to the supreme court in a criminal case annuls the judgment below, and that therefore, pending the appeal, a pardon remitting part of a judgment is inoperative; but this was not necessary to the decision. State v. McIntire (1853) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 1, 59 Am. Dec. 566.

While beyond the scope of this note, reference may be made in this connection to State v. Underwood (1870) 64 N. C. 599, where, on an appeal to the supreme court from a judgment against the accused, it was held there was no error, but before judgment was entered below on the transcript from the supreme court, the defendant produced a pardon, and it was held that the appeal had vacated the judgment, and that the pardon thus being before judgment, there were no costs to be paid by the accused.

Where a pardon is granted pending an appeal, the usual practice is to dismiss the appeal. Cole v. State (1907) 84 Ark. 473, 106 S. W. 673; Manlove v. State (1899) 153 Ind. 80, 53 N. E. 385; Phillips v. State (1880) 58 Miss. 578; Gilmore v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 639, 139 Am. St. Rep. 981, 108 Pac. 416; Chapman v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 643, 108 Pac. 418; White v. State (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 644, 108 Pac. 1135; Lack v. State (1915) 11 Okla. Crim. Rep. 420, 149 Pac. 924; Stewart v. State (1915) 11 Okla. Crim. Rep. 400, 146 Pac. 921; Sibenaler v. State (1915) 11 Okla. Crim. Rep. 504, 148 Pac. 678; Terrell v. State (1915) 11 Okla. Crim. Rep. 529, 148 Pac. 822; Keith v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 618, 117 Pac. 652; Woodland v. State (1915) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 152 Pac. 810; State v. White (1895) 26 Or. 605, 40 Pac. 229.

The same practice applies on the granting of a parole. Cadenhead v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 514, 117 Pac. 462; Parks v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 617, 117 Pac. 651; James v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 630, 117 Pac. 651; Arnold v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 615, 117 Pac. 652; Rhoads v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 619, 117 Pac. 652; *Smallwood v. #### TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

ERNEST SHELBY et al., Plffs. in Err.

(— Tenn. —, 188 S. W. 1147.)

Corporation — foreign — failure to comply with laws — partnership liability.

1. Holders of stock in a foreign corporation which has not complied with the laws entitling it to do business in the state, but which maintains an office and undertakes to carry on its business in the state, are liable as partners for services rendered under contract with those in charge of the office.

For other cases, see Corporations, VII. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — As to partnership liability of stockholders of a foreign corporation in a state in which it is doing business, see annotation following this case, post, 574. L.R.A.1917B.

Writ and process — sufficiency of summons — action against partners.

2. A warrant is sufficient to hold stockholders in a foreign corporation not authorized to do business in the state liable as partners which describes them as stockholders in a foreign corporation not authorized to do business in the state, and summons them to answer an action on account for labor rendered.

For other cases, see Writ and Process, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(October 28, 1916.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rhea County in plaintiffs' favor in consolidated actions brought to recover compensation for services rendered to a foreign corporation in which defendants were stockholders. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wright & Haggard and C. G. Myers, for plaintiffs in error:

Failure of a foreign corporation to comply with positive requirements of the law as a prerequisite to its having corporate existence, and its transacting business in the state, renders its stockholders personally liable for the companies' debts.

Corser, 34 Minn. 355, 25 N. W. 799.

Messrs. D. M. Rhea and J. B. Swafford for defendants in error.

Neill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendants in error were stockholders in a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Delaware, but which had its office and transacted its business in Rhea county, Tennessee, without having complied with the statutes of the state permitting foreign corporations to do business here. The corporation was chartered as a development company for the purpose of developing the mineral and timber resources of the territory adjacent to Spring City, in Rhea county, including the promotion of several industries. Carrying out this purpose it came to Spring City, rented buildings, hired transportation, had options taken on certain lands, and had in its employ there a chief engineer and an assistant engineer, who had charge of a body of servants, employees of the company, engaged in making surveys and maps of lands on which the alleged company held options, and which surveys were being made for the benefit of the company. In one of the offices which was maintained at Spring City it had in its employ a stenographer who wrote the correspondence with reference to the business of the company, and these letters were always signed, "Central Tennessee Development Co., per ——— Secy." Its board of directors and stockholders were permitted to meet at this office and confer concerning the business of the concern, and it kept and used at this office a corporate seal. The plaintiffs in error did work for them in carrying out these purposes, and compensation was sought for this work by the suit L.R.A.1917B.

mentioned in the margin, and other suits consolidated therewith.

It was contended in the trial court that the defendants in error were liable as partners, and the trial judge, in effect, so charged the jury.

Was this the correct view? We think it was.

Foreign corporations have no right to do business in this state unless they first comply with the provisions of our statutes, with reference to the filing of their charters, etc. If they fail to do so, they have no standing before the courts for the enforcement of any rights, with two exceptions, which we shall presently note. Cary-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 92 Tenn. 587, 22 S. W. 743; New Hampshire Ins. Co. v. Kennedy, 96 Tenn. 711, 36 S. W. 709; New York Nat. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Cannon, 99 Tenn. 344, 41 S. W. 1054; Advance Lumber Co. v. Moore, 126 Tenn. 313, 148 S. W. 212; Interstate Amusement Co. v. Albert, 128 Tenn. 417, 427, 161 S. W. 488; and compare Singer Mfg. Co. v. Draper, 103 Tenn. 262, 52 S. W. 879.

The exceptions above referred to are State v. O'Brien, 94 Tenn. 79, 26 L.R.A. 252, 28 S. W. 311, holding that a servant of a company, who has feloniously appropriated its money, is estopped to defend on the ground of the company's failure to comply; the case of Memphis & A. River Packet Co. v. Agnew, 132 Tenn. 265, L.R.A.1916A, 640, 177 S. W. 949, holding that an unfaithful servant of such company, who has made profits by the use of the company's business for his own purposes, cannot defend, when called to account, by showing that the company had failed to comply; and finally the case of State v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 114 Tenn. 194, 86 S. W. 390, in which it was held that where such company had attempted to comply, but had inadvertently omitted one requirement, it would not be ousted from the state except upon a direct suit for that purpose by the state. We have no direct decision upon the question whether stockholders of such a corporation carrying on business would be liable as partners; but we have two cases which are based substantially on the same principle. In Morton v. Hart Bros. 88 Tenn. 427, 12 S. W. 1026, it was held that where a foreign insurance company had failed to comply, an agent who took a policy in its name was personally liable thereon, since, inasmuch as he could not bind his principal, he bound himself. In Carter v. McClure, 96 Tenn. 109, 36 L.R.A. 282, 60 Am. St. Rep. 842, 38 S. W. 585, it appeared that certain persons associated themselves together for the purpose of carrying on a co-operative store, entered into a written agreement providing for directors and for stockholders, and called themselves stockholders, and set forth the amount which was to be employed in the business, and carried on the business for a profit, but were, in fact, not incorporated. The concern finally failed, and the so-called stockholders were sued as partners, and the court held they were liable as such, on the ground that the persons concerned composed an association carrying on a business for profit, and, it not being a corporation, the law had no other name for it than that of a partnership. To the same effect is the case of Harrill v. Davis, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1153, 94 C. C. A. 47, 168 Fed. 187, in which will be found an elaborate discussion of the point.

A direct authority is found in Taylor v. Branham, 35 Fla. 297, 39 L.R.A. 362, 48 Am. St. Rep. 249, 17 So. 552, in which it was held that a corporation chartered in Tennessee had no right to transact business in Florida without complying with the laws of that state, prescribing certain conditions for the entering of that state by foreign corporations, and that the stockholders who undertook to carry on the business of such foreign corporations were liable as partners. The same principle is found laid down in Mandeville v. Courtright, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1003, 73 C. C. A. 321, 142 Fed. 97. In that case it was held that a dental company chartered in New Jersey had no right to carry on its business in Pennsylvania, by virtue of its New Jersey charter, and that its stockholders carrying on such business in Pennsylvania became personally liable as partners. In the case it appeared that an employee of the company fractured a woman's jaw while trying to operate upon her teeth. The stockholders were held liable for damages, as partners.

The general principle is that stated in Carter v. McClure and Harrill v. Davis, supra, that where persons are associated together, carrying on a business for profit, they are prima facie partners, no matter what name they use, and they cannot escape except by showing that they were a corporation.

The fact that plaintiffs in error dealt with them in their corporate name can avail them nothing. Harrill v. Davis, supra; Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 346, 12 L.R.A. 366, 369, 15 S. W. 505, and see note. It does not appear that plaintiffs in error knew that the corporation had not complied with the Tennessee laws. However, we do not think this would have made any difference, since the corporation was without the power of contracting, and, as the defendants in error could not bind it, they necessarily bound themselves. Morton v. Hart Bros. supra.

It should be noted that the principles above announced do not apply to corporation de facto; that is, those which have made a bona fide effort to comply with the provisions of law and have inadvertently failed in some particular, and in good faith have exercised the franchises of such corporation. Merriman v. Magiveny, 12 Heisk. 494; Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Owen, L.R.A.1916C, 189, and note, 37 Okla. 616, 133 Pac. 193. And see note to Rutherford v. Hill, 17 L.R.A. 549.

The learned court of civil appeals was of the opinion that the defendants in error were liable as partners, but held that the warrant was not adequately framed against them as such, and on that ground reversed the judgment of the trial court. We think the court of civil appeals was somewhat too strict in its construction of the warrant. The suit was originally brought before a justice of the peace, and subsequently appealed to the circuit court of Rhea county, and there tried. The warrant, instead of describing the defendants in error in terms as partners, described them as stockholders in a foreign corporation not authorized to do business in the state of Tennessee, and summoned the defendants in error to answer in an action by account for labor rendered. This is very meager, it is true, but it sufficiently notified the defendants in error of the grounds on which they were to be held liable; that is, for transacting business in Tennessee under the name of a foreign corporation without having complied with the laws authorizing such transaction of business, such business, of course, implying an effort to obtain profit. This was using the definition for the name. The defendants in error, when so summoned, could not misunderstand what they were called upon to defend, so the purpose of requiring some general statement of the cause of action in the warrant of the justice of the peace was sufficiently complied with. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals must be reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed.

Annotation—Partnership liability of stockholders of a foreign corporation in a state in which it is doing business.

The general question of the partnership liability of stockholders in case of defective or illegal incorporation is discussed in the notes to Rutherford v. Hill, L.R.A.1917B.

17 L.R.A. 549, and Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Owen, L.R.A.1916C, 196. This note is confined to a discussion of whether or not such a partnership liability arises in the case of a corporation organized in one state—regularly, it may be—which is doing business in another. The determination of this question is rendered difficult from the obscurity of some of the reports as to whether those stockholders who are sought to be held liable were themselves actively participating in such business. A liability based upon such participation is a different thing than a liability based upon the mere relation of stockholder. It is going considerably farther to hold that a liability arises from the relation of stockholder without any active participation in the management of the business, than to hold that a liability arises on the part of those who actively participate in such management.

An attempt is sometimes made to question the compliance of a foreign corporation with the laws of the state of its organization in a suit against some members in another state. Such cases in which the corporation does not appear to have been doing business in the state of the forum are excluded.<sup>1</sup>

It is the theory of some early cases that an act of incorporation can have no extraterritorial effect.<sup>2</sup> Accordingly, incorporation in a foreign state is no protection against liability arising from the manner in which a group of persons are doing business; if they are doing business as a partnership, a partnership liability arises. But this doctrine has not been generally accepted. The relation existing between the states is such as to make it impracticable. By the rules of comity one state will recognize a corporation formed in another.<sup>3</sup> Accordingly, where a corporation is regularly formed in one state, its stockholders cannot be held liable as partners, where it has been carrying on business in another.<sup>4</sup> This is especially true where the policy of the state is to give foreign corporations the right to do business

<sup>2</sup> The Florida court in Taylor v. Branham (1895) 35 Fla. 297, 39 L.R.A. 362, 48 Am. St. Rep. 249, 17 So. 552, expressed an opinion in accord with this theory, but that decision is finally based upon the fact that the corporation, although chartered in Tennessee, was organized in Florida.

It is stated in March v. Eastern R. Co. (1860) 40 N. H. 548, 77 Am. Dec. 732, that the only effect of the refusal to recognize a foreign corporation as such would be to compel the members to hold their property and maintain their rights as partners.

Upon the general question of whether or not a foreign corporation can be regarded as a de facto corporation, see note to Cone Export & Commission Co. v. Poole, 24 L.R.A. 280, subdivision on page 203.

reversed upon appeal. That the corporation had failed to comply with the laws of the state of the forum is denied by the answer of the defendant and this question is not determined. The appellate court states generally that "when once regularly formed in a foreign state, until dissolved according to the laws of that state, the existence of a corporation cannot be destroyed, or even called in question, except to ascertain the fact of its existence at home, by the courts of this state. . . . Such a corporation may be forbidden to enter this state at all, and is forbidden by legislative enactment to do business here except on condition; but that is all. There is no law making such null and void when attempting to do business here without complying with conditions."

It was contended in Second Nat. Bank v. Hall (1878) 35 Ohio St. 158, that the incorporation in the foreign state to conduct a business within the state of the forum was a fraud upon the laws of the state of the forum, because the stockholders were not, by the laws of the state of incorporation, individually liable to any extent for the debt of the corporation. This is apparently based upon the fact that, according to the laws of the state of the forum, the stockholders in a corporation are individually liable to a certain extent for the debt of the corporation. That this did not render the incorporators liable as partners is held in the case, the court stating that how the fact that they are not individually liable for corporate debts can, in the absence of the statutory regulation, operate to make them liable on a promise they never made, either expressly or impliedly, is difficult to understand.

upon complying with certain conditions.<sup>5</sup> It was urged in one case<sup>6</sup> that a corporation which did nothing in the state in which it was organized except to hold its annual elections must be deemed to have migrated to the state in which its business was conducted, and it thereby forfeited its charter in the state of its organization. This contention was denied, and a stockholder of the corporation held not liable as a partner for liabilities incurred by the corporation. The only contract ever made by the stockholder which had any bearing on the question at issue in the case was that which he made on becoming a party to the corporation. The court states that that "certainly did not make him a partner, either of the defendants Brainard, or of Mr. Redfield, the secretary of the company. He gave no power to either to contract for him and no consent to be responsible for their tortious act. His contract with the state of Connecticut was for immunity from personal liability. The plaintiffs insist that the burden is upon him to show how he was ever relieved from the liability of a partner. This is a precise inversion of the rule. The onus is upon the plaintiffs to show that he ever assumed any such liability; or that he became chargeable with it in law, through his own acts or through those of the company. No statute of that state, or of this, has been violated, either by him or by the corporation."

According to the weight of authority the failure of a foreign corporation to comply with the laws of the state in which it is doing business relative to foreign corporations does not render the stockholders liable as partners.<sup>7</sup> At any rate, the partnership relation will not be extended to liabilities not arising by reason of the conduct of a business prohibited from being transacted without a permit.<sup>8</sup> In one case<sup>9</sup> it was sought to hold as partners two members of a <sup>5</sup> Merrick v. Van Santvoord (1866) 34 N. Y. 208. Foreign corporations doing business in the state were required to comply with certain conditions. Whether these conditions were complied with in the case at bar is not stated except by inference, in the statement that no statute of the state had been violated by the corporation.

But see CUNNINGHAM v. SHELBY, ante, 572.

It is stated in National Bank v. Spot Cash Coal Co. (1911) 98 Ark. 597, 136 S. W. 953, that the doing of business in a state by a foreign corporation that has not complied with the laws of the state prescribing conditions upon which such corporations may do business does not have the effect of dissolving such corporation and rendering it in effect a partnership and its officers partners as to such business done within the state.

It is stated in Tribble v. Halbert (1910) 143 Mo. App. 524, 127 S. W. 618, that the bare fact, if proven, that a foreign corporation has not complied with the laws of the state of the forum, is not sufficient to authorize a judgment against stockholders of that corporation as partners upon contracts executed in the name of the corporation. In order to establish such a liability it must be shown that there was fraud of some kind connected with the organization of the corporation.

The fact that a contract is made by a foreign corporation before the date of registration of a certificate does not render those contracting liable individually, where it was not doing business prior to the registration. L.R.A.1917B.

In Smith v. Warden (1885) 86 Mo. 382, the members of a limited partnership association who had failed to comply with the laws of the state where organized, in that they had not recorded the articles of association, as required by the statutes of that state, were held to become general partners even in that state, and, as a necessary result, must be held bound and liable as such in another state in which they were transacting business. The court does not decide the further question as to whether, if there had been a compliance with the laws of the state where organized, the members would have been liable as partners in the other state, but says on this point that "the statutes of Pennsylvania as such can have no extraterritorial force or operation in this state, but rights which had accrued in that state under such statutes might be enforced here."

<sup>8</sup> It was urged in A. Leschen & Sons Rope Co. v. Moser (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 159 S. W. 1018, that the stockholders in a foreign corporation were liable as partners on a debt assumed by it. In denying such liability the court states that the debt could be assumed without taking out a permit to do business in the state, "and we do not think that because the corporation may have engaged in other transactions for which it should have procured a permit, or have maintained an office in Texas without obtaining a permit, we are justified in holding its stockholders liable as partners for the debt assumed. If the stockholders of a corporation which could legally do business in Texas under a permit are to be punished for not obtaining a permit by being held to be partners, such punishment should be limited to liabilities arising from transactions for which the permit is re-foreign corporation whose names were combined into the corporate name on an indorsement by one of the defendants. No copy of the charter and by-laws of the corporation had been filed with the commissioner of corporations, and no copy of the vote appointing him attorney for the service of process had been filed with him. The court, after referring to this fact, states that the defendants are not thereby constituted partners, or made personally liable on the indorsement on the note.

There is some authority, however, for the view that until a foreign corporation has complied with the laws of the state in which it is transacting business, the corporate organization does not relieve its members from personal liability.<sup>10</sup>

When the territorial scope of operations of a corporation is limited by its charter, it has been stated that it cannot exceed such limits without creating the partnership relation between those stockholders and officers who participated.<sup>11</sup>

In the cases discussed in the foregoing part of this note it does not appear but that the corporations involved were regularly incorporated for the purpose of doing business in the state of incorporation; at least, it does not appear that they were organized for the sole purpose of doing business in another state.<sup>12</sup> Where the fact that the corporation was organized for the sole purpose of doing business in another state does appear, the stockholders have, in a number of cases, been held liable as partners,<sup>13</sup> especially if it was organized by citizens of the state in which the business is being conducted, for the purpose of escaping some provision of the law of that state. Thus, an individual who, with others, organized a corporation in a foreign state where the taxing laws were more favorable, has been held personally liable for obligations incurred by the corporation.<sup>14</sup> It has been regarded as fraud rendering the incorporators liable as partners for citizens of one state, who are unable to incorporate in that state because of insufficient subscription to the capital stock, to go into another quired, and not extended to liabilities not arising by reason of the conduct of a business prohibited from being transacted without a permit."

See CUNNINGHAM v. SHELBY, ante, 572.

<sup>11</sup> It is stated obiter in Campbell v. J. I. Campbell Co. (1906) 117 La. 402, 41 So 696, with reference to a lumber company incorporated in Texas and authorized to do business in certain counties in Texas, that when it established a business in Louisiana under another name, and so conducted the business, the stockholders and officers of the corporation who participated in or ratified such action became partners in the business in Louisiana. It was held in this case that the assets of the branch business established in Louisiana would be distributed as assets of the partnership, and the creditors of the corporation would not be allowed to participate therein.

<sup>12</sup> In Merrick v. Van Santvoord (1866) 34 N. Y. 208, it appeared that the entire corporate business was being done in the state of the forum at the time the H.L.R.A. 1917B.

bility on which suit was brought, was incurred.

<sup>13</sup> The right of a corporation to incorporate in one state for the transaction of business in another is denied in Lynch v. Perryman (1911) 29 Okla. 615, 119 Pac. 229, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1065, and the stockholders are stated to be liable as partners.

See CUNNINGHAM v. SHELBY, ante, 572.

<sup>14</sup> In Montgomery v. Forbes (1889) 148 Mass. 249, 19 N. E. 342, an individual, finding the tax laws of New Hampshire more favorable to corporations than the laws of Massachusetts, went to New Hampshire, and, with others, attempted to form a corporation for the manufacture of woolen goods in which he was engaged. The articles of incorporation stated that the business was to be carried on at a place in New Hampshire and another in Massachusetts. The individual first above referred to was the only person interested in the enterprise, the others being merely secured to furnish the necessary number required by the statutes of New Hampshire for corporate organization. The court states that this is not a case where there has been a defective organization of a corporation which has a legal existence under a valid charter, but here there was no corporation; it was just the same as if the individual had done nothing at all in the way of establishing a corporation, but had conducted his business under the corporate name. The business was his personal business, which he transacted under that name. He was accordingly held liable on a contract for the purchase of goods, entered into by him under the corporate name. It was not sought to hold any other members of the pretended corporation liable.

state where a certificate of incorporation might be procured upon the subscription obtained, and there incorporate a company for the sole purpose of carrying on an undertaking in the home state.<sup>15</sup> The statutes of the state of incorporation are construed as not authorizing the creation of a corporation whose entire business was to be conducted in another state. The stipulation in the article of incorporation for a branch office in the state of incorporation does not remedy this, especially where it is shown that the sole design was to conduct the business in the other state, and no branch office was ever established in the state of incorporation.<sup>16</sup> Such an organization in a foreign state has been regarded as fraudulent where only the fact of organization there appears.<sup>17</sup>

On the contrary, it has been held that the residents of one state, who incorporate in another for the purpose of doing business in the former state, are protected against personal liability by the incorporation.<sup>18</sup>

In Journal Co. v. Nelson (1908) 133 Mo. App. 482, 113 S. W. 690, the members of a foreign corporation were held liable as partners on the theory that there had never been any legal existence to the corporation. In this case certain citizens of the state of the forum went into another state and there organized a corporation for the ostensible purpose of doing business in a third state. The representation that its capital stock was fully paid up was untrue, but a very small part of it having been paid. It had no home in either the state of its incorporation or that in which it stated that it was to transact business, but was lodged in the state of the forum. The entire transaction was held a fraud and the members thereof liable as partners. It appears, however, that all the members had actively participated in the transactions of the company.

<sup>17</sup> In Hill v. Beach (1858) 12 N. J. Eq. 31, a corporation organized in one state by individuals who were interested in a stone quarry in another, for the purpose of operating the quarry, was held not to be a corporation, in an action by one of the stockholders to recover his share of the corporate property. "They are not a domestic corporation," says the court, "and cannot be sued as such; they are not a foreign corporation, for it is perfectly manifest upon the face of their proceedings that their attempted organization under the general law of New York with respect to corporations was a fraud upon the law of that state. These individuals, then, must be treated and dealt with by the law as L.R.A.1917B.

While it thus appears that corporate organization in one state has been held no protection against partnership liability in a state in which the business was being conducted, the cases in which this was held presented some very strong features of evasion of the laws of that state and, at least, in some of the cases, of the laws of the state where incorporation took place. In the absence of such exceptional circumstances, it seems that no partnership liability should be held to exist. This seems especially true in view of the extensive corporate organization of the present time in states whose laws are favorable to such organization. At least it should require more than a showing that the corporation was organized in the foreign state for the purpose of taking advantage of favorable laws, to impose a partnership liability.

Where a corporation chartered in one state is organized in another, in which the board of directors is elected and the business carried on, without any attempt to acquire corporate existence in the latpartners trading under the name they have assumed."

<sup>18</sup> DeMarest v. Flack (1891) 128 N. Y. 205, 13 L.R.A. 854, 28 N. E. 645. The state in which the corporation was organized had a policy favoring the formation of such corporations the certificate of incorporation was issued by the proper official of that state with knowledge of all the facts, and this was held to constitute the organization a valid incorporation in that state. The policy of the state in which the business was being conducted was held not to prevent the formation of such corporations, but to recognize them when coming into the state and conforming with the terms laid down by the statute as conditions of allowing them to transact business. The statute of the state of the incorporation provided for the holding of meetings of the corporation, including the first general meeting for purposes of organization, out of the state, and also for the keeping of the principal office of the corporation in any state or territory of the United States. It does not appear whether the first general meeting for the purpose of organization was in fact held out of the state of the incorporation.

A contrary decision appears in the early New York case of Kruse v. Dusenbury (1884) 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. Supp. 87, where the members of a foreign corporation who were engaged in the corporate business in New York were held liable as partners upon an obligation incurred while transacting such business, where the corporation had no office in the state of its incorporation, as fixed in the certificate of incorporation, and did no business there.

It is denied in Second Nat. Bank v. Hall (1878) 35 Ohio St. 158, that the incorporater state, the members are liable as partners.<sup>19</sup> In one such case<sup>20</sup> it is stated that "where a corporation has been legally created and organized under the laws of a sister state for the transaction of any business there, it may, by comity existing between the states, transact business in this state, provided it be not in contravention of our laws or public policy. Our general incorporating laws recognize the transaction of business by foreign corporations in this state, and, in the absence of express legislative assertion to the contrary, the courts of this state would be bound to recognize the comity existing among the states. While this is true, it is also well settled that a corporation created under the laws of one state cannot hold corporate meetings in another for the purpose of organizing the corporation, electing its officers, or performing any strictly corporate functions in its organization." If there is no organization of the corporation, the stockholders are liable as partners.<sup>21</sup>

Where a corporation is organized in one state to do business in another, where such business could not be legally carried on by a corporation, the stockholders are liable as partners.<sup>22</sup> At least, so many of the stockholders as assented to the conduct of the business and were associated therein are so liable.<sup>23</sup>

The alleged corporation not having a de facto existence, the fact that the party attempting to hold the members liable as partners contracted with it does not estop him to call in question the corporate character, where he did not know that it was an incorporated organization.<sup>24</sup> It has been held that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to prevent one who has contracted with a corporation from denying the corporate existence, and holding the members thereof liable as partners.<sup>25</sup>

tion in one state of a corporation to conduct a business within another is a fraud upon the laws of the latter state. See further discussion of case, supra.

<sup>21</sup> In Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (1891) 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 346, 12 L.R.A. 366, 15 S. W. 505, it is stated that by the rule of comity a corporation organized under the laws of that state may conduct business beyond the borders of that state, but the corporation is required to organize, and that organization must take place under the laws of the state where the organization is authorized, and not elsewhere. An attempt to organize the corporation is not sufficient, and does not meet the requirement and demand of the law, nor does it comply with the rule of comity; the corporation must organize, else it is not a corporation. In the case at bar no organization by the defendant as a corporation at any time or place was shown. One of the witnesses testified that an organization took place in the state where the business was to be conducted, but no evidence was introduced on that subject.

A. 321, 142 Fed. 97, holding the stockholders in a corporation organized to carry on the denistry business in violation of local law, who were associated in the conduct of the business, personally liable for injury inflicted by the incompetence of an employee upon a person who submitted to treatment without knowing the pretended corporate character under which the persons were operating. See note appended to this case on the personal liability at common law of officers or stockholders of a corporation to the other party to an act or transaction in excess of the corporate powers, or in violation of law.

<sup>25</sup> Cleaton v. Emery (1892) 49 Mo. App. 345, it is stated that the doctrine of estoppel in that state has been confined to cases where the corporation, or those claiming under it, assert some rights under the contract.

CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY OF ILLINOIS, Trustee, etc., of Frank E. Scott Transfer Company, Bankrupt, Appt.,
v.

CHICAGO AUDITORIUM ASSOCIATION.
(No. 162.)

CHICAGO AUDITORIUM ASSOCIATION, Appt. and Petitioner,
v.

CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY OF ILLINOIS, Trustee, etc., of Frank E. Scott Transfer Company. (No. 174.)

Appeal — bankruptcy case — Federal question.

1. A decision of a circuit court of appeals that a claim against a bankrupt estate for damages growing out of the anticipatory breach of an executory contract, while allowable as a provable debt for the term during which that court thought that the contract was mutually obligatory, should not be allowed beyond that period, is not reviewable in the Federal Supreme Court under the Bankrupt Act of July 1, 1898, § 25b-1, as presenting a Federal question which would sustain a writ of error to a state court.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, II. a, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Bankruptcy — provable debt — damages for anticipatory breach of contract.

2. The filing of an involuntary petition in bankruptcy against a baggage transfer and livery corporation, followed by an adjudication of bankruptcy, is the equivalent of an anticipatory breach of its executory contract with a hotel company for the latter's baggage and livery business, where the trustee in bankruptcy does not elect to assume performance, and gives rise to a claim provable in the bankruptcy proceedings, as one "founded," within the meaning of the Act of July 1, 1898, § 63a-4, "upon a contract, express or implied."

For other cases, see Bankruptcy, IV. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — term of allowance.

3. A bankruptcy court, in allowing as a provable debt a claim for damages arising out of the anticipatory breach by the bankrupt of its executory contract with a hotel company for the latter's baggage and livery business, should not limit it to the damages for the six months following such breach, although the contract reserved to the hotel company an option to revoke the privileges by giving six months' notice in writing of its election so to do, in which case both parties were to be released from further liability at the expiration of the six months. For other cases, see Bankruptcy, IV. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(April 3, 1916.)

A PPEAL from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit to review a decree which, reversing a decree of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, allowed as a provable debt against the bankrupt estate a part of the damages growing out of the bankrupt's anticipatory breach of an executory contract. Affirmed.

CROSS APPEAL from, and Certiorari to, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit on behalf of the creditors to review the same decree. Appeal dismissed, and decree reversed on certiorari.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The present case does not involve an anticipatory breach of contract.

Williams v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 236 U. S. 549, 59 L. ed. 713, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289.

Mr. Justice Pitney delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 22, 1911, a creditors' petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Frank E. Scott Transfer Company, an Illinois corporation, and it was adjudged a bankrupt on August 7. The act of bankruptcy charged and adjudicated does not appear. When the proceedings were commenced, the bankrupt held contract relations with the Chicago Auditorium Association under a written agreement made between them February 1, 1911, which had been partially performed. By its terms the Association granted to the Transfer Company, for a term of five years from the date of the contract, the baggage and livery privilege of the Auditorium Hotel, in the city of Chicago; that is to say, the sole and exclusive right, so far as it was within the legal capacity of the Association to grant the same, to transfer baggage and carry passengers to and from the hotel and to furnish livery to its guests and patrons. For the baggage privilege the Transfer Company agreed to pay to the Association the sum of $6,000, in monthly instalments of $100 each, and for L.R.A.1917B.

the livery privilege the sum of $15,000, in monthly instalments of $250 each, and also agreed to furnish to the hotel and its guests and patrons prompt and efficient baggage and livery service at reasonable rates at all times during the continuance of the privileges. It was further agreed as follows:

"The party of the first part [Chicago Auditorium Association], however, reserves the right, which is an express condition of the foregoing grants, to cancel and revoke either or both of said privileges, by giving six months' notice in writing of its election so to do, whenever the service is not, in the opinion of the party of the first part, satisfactory, or in the event of any change in management of said hotel; and in case of the termination of either or both of said privileges by exercise of the right and option reserved by this paragraph, such privilege or privileges shall cease and determine at the expiration of the six months' notice aforesaid, and both parties hereto shall in that case be released from further liability respecting the concession so canceled and revoked.

"Said rights and concessions shall not be assignable without the express written consent of the party of the first part, nor shall the assignment of the same, with such written consent, relieve the party of the second part [Scott Transfer Company] from liability on the covenants and agreements of this instrument."

The contract authorized the Association, in the event of default by the Transfer Company in the payment of any instalment of money due, or in the performance of any other covenant, if continued for thirty days, to terminate the privileges at its option, without releasing the Transfer Company from liability upon its covenants. Should either or both of the privileges be thus terminated before January 31, 1916, the Association was to be at liberty to sell the privileges, or make a new or different contract for the remainder of the term, but was not to be obliged to do this, and the Transfer Company, unless released in writing, was to remain liable for the entire amount agreed to be paid by it.

Up to the time of the bankruptcy this contract remained in force, and neither party had violated any of its covenants. The trustee in bankruptcy did not elect to assume its performance, and the Association entered into a contract with other parties for the performance of the baggage and livery service, and obtained therefrom the sum of $234.69 monthly as compensation for those privileges. On February 28, 1912, it exhibited its proof against the bankrupt estate, claiming an indebtedness of $6,537.94, of which $311.20 had accrued prior to the bankruptcy proceedings, and the remainder was claimed as unliquidated damages arising under the contract for alleged breach thereof on the part of the bankrupt through the bankruptcy proceedings. Of this amount $691.86 represented the loss incurred during the first six months of bankruptcy. Objections filed by the trustee were sustained by the referee, except as to that portion of the claim which had accrued prior to the bankruptcy proceedings. On review, the district court sustained this decision. On appeal to the circuit court of appeals, the order of the district court was reversed, and the cause remanded with direction to allow $691.86 upon the claim, and to disallow the remaining portion. 132 C. C. A. 452, 216 Fed. 308.

An appeal to this court by the trustee in bankruptcy was allowed, under § 25b-2 of the Bankruptcy Act (of July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, 553, Comp. Stat. 1913, §§ 9585, 9609), upon a certificate by a justice of this court that the determination of the question involved was essential to a uniform construction of the act throughout the United States. This is No. 162. Thereafter a cross appeal by the Auditorium Association was allowed by one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals. This is No. 174.

A motion is made to dismiss the cross appeal, and this must be granted. In the absence of the certificate prescribed by § 25b-2, the sole authority for an appeal from a decision of the circuit court of appeals, allowing or rejecting a claim, is found in § 25b-1: "Where the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars, and the question involved is one which might have been taken on appeal or writ of error from the highest court of a state to the Supreme Court of the United States." This limits such appeals to cases where Federal questions are involved, of the kind described in § 237, Judicial Code (36 Stat. at L. 1156, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 1214). The motion to dismiss is resisted upon the ground that the claim of the Association to damages beyond a period of six months was denied by the court of appeals as not constituting a provable debt in bankruptcy, and that a Federal question is thus necessarily presented, provability depending upon a construction of the bankruptcy act. An examination of the opinion of that court, however, shows that while it held that damages for anticipatory breach of the contract were provable, it held that the contract itself, because of the option reserved to the Auditorium Association to cancel it on six months' notice, was mutually obligatory for that term only, and hence no damages beyond that period were allowable. This involved no Federal question. Chapman v. Bowen, 207 U. S. 89, 92, 52 L. ed. 116, 117, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32.

But, in view of the general importance of the question of the amount allowable in its relation to the questions involved in the trustee's appeal, we have concluded that a certiorari should be allowed in lieu of the cross appeal.

Coming to the merits: It is no longer open to question in this court that, as a rule, where a party bound by an executory contract repudiates his obligations or disables himself from performing them before the time for performance, the promisee has the option to treat the contract as ended, so far as further performance is concerned, and maintain an action at once for the damages occasioned by such anticipatory breach. The rule has its exceptions, but none that now concerns us. Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 18, 19, 44 L. ed. 953, 960, 961, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780. And see O'Neill v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 70 N. J. L. 410, 412, 57 Atl. 463, 1 Ann. Cas. 422. There is no doubt that the same rule must be applied where a similar repudiation or disablement occurs during performance. Whether the intervention of bankruptcy constitutes such a breach and gives rise to a claim provable in the bankruptcy proceedings is a question not covered by any previous decision of this court, and upon which the other Federal courts are in conflict. It was, however, held in Lovell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 274, 28 L. ed. 423, 426, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390, where a life insurance company became insolvent and transferred its assets to another company, that a policy holder was entitled to regard his contract as terminated and demand whatever damages he had sustained thereby. And see Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 252, 256, 32 L. ed. 669, 670, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295. In support of the provability of the claim in controversy, Ex parte Poliard, 2 Low. Dec. 411, Fed. Cas. Cases of the latter class are distinguishable because of the "diversity between duties which touch the realty, and the mere personality." Co. Litt. 292, b, § 513.

The contract with which we have to deal was not a contract of personal service simply, but was of such a nature as evidently to require a considerable amount of capital, in the shape of equipment, etc., for its proper performance by the Transfer Company. The immediate effect of bankruptcy was to strip the company of its assets, and thus disable it from performing. It may be conceded that the contract was assignable, and passed to the trustee under § 70a (30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9654), to the extent that it had an option to perform it in the place of the bankrupt (see Sparhawk v. Yerkes, 142 U. S. 1, 13, 35 L. ed. 915, 918, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104; Sunflower Oil Co. v. Wilson, 142 U. S. 313, 322, 35 L. ed. 1025, 1028, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 235); for although there was a stipulation against assignment without consent of the Auditorium Association, it may be assumed that this did not prevent an assignment by operation of law. Still, the trustee in bankruptcy did not elect to assume performance, and so the matter is left as if the law had conferred no such election.

It is argued that there can be no anticipatory breach of a contract except it result from the voluntary act of one of the parties, and that the filing of an involuntary petition in bankruptcy, with adjudication thereon, is but the act of the law resulting from an adverse proceeding instituted by creditors. This view was taken, with respect to the effect of a state proceeding restraining a corporation from the further prosecution of its business or the exercise of its corporate franchises, appointing a receiver, and dissolving the corporation, in People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 91 N. Y. 174, cited with approval in some of the Federal court decisions above referred to. In that case, it did not appear that the company was the responsible cause of the action of the state, so as to make the dissolution its own act; but, irrespective of this, we cannot accept the reasoning. As was said in Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 19, 44 L. ed. 960, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780: "The parties to a contract which is wholly executory have a right to the maintenance of the contractual relations up to the time for performance, as well as to a performance of the contract when due." Commercial credits are, to a large extent, based upon the reasonable expectation that pending contracts of acknowledged validity will be performed in due course; and the same principle that entitles the promisee to continued willingness entitles him to continued ability on the part of the promisor. In short, it must be deemed an implied term of every contract that the promisor will not permit himself, through insolvency or acts of bankruptcy, to be disabled from making performance; and, in this view, bankruptcy proceedings are but the natural and legal consequence of something done or omitted to be done by the bankrupt, in violation of his engagement. It is the purpose of the Bankruptcy Act, generally speaking, to permit all creditors to share in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt, and to leave the honest debtor thereafter free from liability upon previous obligations. Williams v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 236 U. S. 549, 554, 59 L. ed. 713, 716, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289. Executory agreements play so important a part in the commercial world that it would lead to most unfortunate results if, by interpreting the act in a narrow sense, persons entitled to performance of such agreements on the part of bankrupts were excluded from participation in bankrupt estates, while the bankrupts themselves, as a necessary corollary, were left still subject to action for nonperformance in the future, although without the property or credit often necessary to enable them to perform. We conclude that proceedings, whether voluntary or involuntary, resulting in an adjudication of bankruptcy, are the equivalent of an anticipatory breach of an executory agreement within the doctrine of Roehm v. Horst, supra.

The claim for damages by reason of such a breach is "founded upon a contract, express or implied," within the meaning of § 63a-4, and the damages may be liquidated under § 63b. Frederic L. Grant Shoe Co. v. W. M. Laird Co. 212 U. S. 445, 448, 53 L. ed. 591, 593, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332. It is true that in Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 631, 57 L. ed. 676, 678, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664, we held that the debts provable under § 63a-4 include only such as existed at the time of the filing of the petition. But we agree with what was said in Ex parte Pollard, 2 Low. Dec. 411, Fed. Cas. No. 11,252, that it would be "an unnecessary and false nicety" to hold that because it was the act of filing the petition that wrought the breach, therefore there was no breach at the time of the petition. As was held by the same learned judge in Re Pettingill, 137 Fed. 143, 147: "The test of provability under the act of 1898 may be stated thus: If the bankrupt, at the time of bankruptcy, by disabling himself from performing the contract in question, and by repudiating its obligation, could give the proving creditor the right to maintain at once a suit in which damages could be assessed at law or in equity, then the creditor can prove in bankruptcy on the ground that bankruptcy is the equivalent of disenabling and repudiation. For the assessment of damages proceedings may be directed by the court under § 63b (30 Stat. at L. 563, chap. 541, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9647)." It was in effect so ruled by this court in Lesser v. Gray, 236 U. S. 70, 75, 59 L. ed. 471, 475, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227, where it was said: "If, as both the bankruptcy and state courts concluded, the contract was terminated by the involuntary bankruptcy proceeding, no legal injury resulted. If on the other hand, that view of the law was erroneous, then there was a breach and defendant Gray became liable for any resulting damage; but he was released therefrom by his discharge." Of course, he could not be released unless the debt was provable.

We therefore conclude that the circuit court of appeals was correct in holding that the intervention of bankruptcy constituted such a breach of the contract in question as entitled the Auditorium Association to prove its claim.

The denial of all damages except such as accrued within six months after the filing of the petition was based upon the ground that the contract reserved to the Association an option to revoke the privileges by giving six months' notice in writing of its election so to do, in which case both parties were to be released from further liability at the expiration of the six months. It was held that because of this the contract was mutually obligatory for that term only, and uncertain and without force for any longer term of service in futuro, within the ruling of this court in Dunbar v. Dunbar, 190 U. S. 340, 47 L. ed. 1084, 23 Sup. Ct.

Rep. 757. In that case the contract was to pay to a divorced wife "during her life, or until she marries, for her maintenance and support, yearly, the sum of $500;" and it was held that for instalments falling due after bankruptcy the husband remained liable, notwithstanding his discharge, on the ground that the wife's claim for such payments was not provable because of the impossibility of calculating the continuance of widowhood so as to base a valuation upon it. The court referred to the 1903 amendment of § 17 of the Bankruptcy Act (32 Stat. at L. 797, chap. 487, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9601), relating to debts not affected by a discharge, and including among these a liability for alimony due or to become due for maintenance or support of wife or child. This, while enacted after the Dunbar suit was begun, and not applicable to it, was cited as showing the legislative trend in the direction of not discharging an obligation of the bankrupt for the support of his wife or children. The authority of that decision cannot be extended to cover such a case as the present. Here the obligation of the bankrupt was clear and unconditional. The right reserved to the Auditorium Association to cancel and revoke the privileges was reserved for its benefit, not that of the grantee of those privileges. It does not lie in the mouth of the latter, or of its trustee, to say that its service would not be satisfactory, and there is no presumption that otherwise it would have been advantageous to the Association to exercise the option. It results that the decree, in so far as it limits the provable claim to a period of six months after the bankruptcy, must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

No. 162. Decree affirmed.

No. 174. Appeal dismissed, certiorari allowed, and decree reversed.

Annotation—Bankruptcy: damages for anticipatory breach of contract as provable claim.

The decision in CENTRAL TRUST CO. v. CHICAGO AUDITORIUM ASSO. ante, 580, to the effect that damages for an anticipatory breach of contract constitute a claim provable in a bankruptcy proceeding as one "founded upon a contract, express or implied," within the meaning of § 63a-4 of the Federal Bankruptcy Act, having been rendered by the court of last resort, seems conclusively to settle the law upon this question as well as that, where the obligation of the bankrupt is clear and unconditional, the damages should be for the entire unexpired term of the contract, and are not limited to the period of time which, by the terms of the contract, must intervene between notice of an option to revoke and the taking effect of the notice. And, in connection with these rules, it is also worthy of note that this case is also authoritative upon the proposition that bankruptcy proceedings, whether voluntary or involuntary, are the equivalent of an anticipatory breach of an executory contract (decisions of the earlier Federal courts both pro and con upon this question are cited in the opinion), and that while debts provable under § 63a-4 include only such as existed at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy (this rule was established by Zavelo v. Reeves (1913) 227 U. S. 625, 57 L. ed. 676, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664), damages for a breach of contract wrought by the filing of the petition constitute an existing debt within the meaning of the rule.

OSCAR WILLIAMS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(— Ark. —, 188 S. W. 826.)

Contempt — refusal of convict to testify.

1. A court may punish for contempt a convict who refuses to testify when brought before it as a witness although there is no statutory authority to compel or to provide for his attendance.

For other cases, see Contempt, I. c, in Dig 1-52 N. S.

Criminal law — suspension of sentence to punish for contempt.

2. The court which sentenced one convicted of murder cannot, after he has begun to serve his sentence, suspend it for the purpose of punishing him for contempt for refusal to testify in another case.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, IV. g, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — solitary confinement — unusual punishment.

3. Solitary confinement not provided for by law is an unusual punishment within the meaning of a constitutional provision forbidding cruel and unusual punishment.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County convicting him of contempt of court. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert L. Rogers for appellant.

Messrs. Wallace Davis, Attorney General, and Hamilton Moses, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Oscar Williams, has brought here for review the record of the proceedings of the circuit court of Pulaski county, wherein he was adjudged by that court to be in contempt, and sentenced, as a punishment for said contempt, to "solitary confinement" in the county jail of Pulaski county for a period of four months. It appears from the record that appellant was, on April 19, 1916, tried upon an indictment charging him with murder in the second degree and was convicted of that offense and sentenced to the state penitentiary for a term of five years; and on April 28th he was duly sentenced by the court, and was delivered to the state penitentiary to begin his sentence.

L. B. King was indicted on the charge of being an accessory after the fact to the crime committed by appellant, and was placed on trial in the Pulaski circuit court. Appellant was brought out of the penitentiary to attend the trial of King, and was by the state introduced as a witness; but he refused to testify in response to certain questions propounded to him by the prosecuting attorney, whereupon the trial court remanded appellant to the county jail until the next day. It is stated in the briefs, and not denied, that King was acquitted, though it does not appear that that fact was brought into the record in the present proceedings. At any rate, the appellant was subsequently brought out of jail upon order of the trial court, and an order was made, setting aside the judgment of conviction, and he was put on trial before the court for contempt in refusing to testify in the King trial. Certain questions were propounded to appellant by the court and by the prosecuting attorney as to his reason for refusing to testify against King; and as he gave no satisfactory excuse for such refusal, the court adjudged him to be in contempt, and ordered him confined in the county jail in "solitary confinement" until September 16, 1916, a

It is contended in the first place that there was no statutory authority for the court to compel, or to provide for, the attendance of appellant as a witness; but we pass over that point without discussion, as we are of the opinion that when appellant was brought into court, by whatever means that were adopted, the court had the power to compel him to testify and to punish him for contempt for his refusal. The statute (Acts 1913, p. 961) makes a convict competent as a witness, and the court had jurisdiction over his person when he came, or was brought, into court.

We pass, therefore, to the more serious question whether or not the court had the power to set aside the former judgment of conviction of felony, which judgment was then being enforced, for the purpose of imposing punishment for contempt and enforcing the judgment. While the question is not entirely free from doubt, we are of the opinion that the court possessed no such power. The attorney general relies upon the established doctrine that all courts have continuing powers over their own judgments during the terms at which they are rendered; but, while that power is an undoubted one, there are limitations upon the extent to which it may be exercised. There seems to be no question about the power of the court to set aside a judgment of conviction before the convict has begun serving his sentence, nor is there any doubt that the court has the power, at any time during the term, to set aside a judgment for the correction of errors. Here we have a case of the court attempting to set aside a judgment, not before the term of the sentence was begun, nor for the purpose of correcting any errors, but merely for the purpose of imposing another sentence during the period of the suspension of the judgment.

The court, in its order imposing the punishment of confinement in the jail, ordered that the appellant be brought into court at the expiration of the term for further proceedings in the original cause. The law takes no account of parts of a term of sentence, which continues from beginning to end as one term. Therefore the court was without power to separate it into parts for the purpose of giving time to punish for other offenses. This does not mean, of course, that courts are without power to punish convicts for other crimes. On the contrary, we have held that a convict, serving a life term, may be tried and executed for a capital offense. Bell v. State, 120 Ark. 530, 180 S. W. 186. That is so because the lower punishment of imprisonment is merged into the higher one, the infliction of the death penalty.

There can be no higher punishment for contempt than that which had already been imposed on appellant by his conviction of a felony. A punishment by confinement in the county jail might have been imposed to run after the expiration of his other sentence, but there is no such punishment known to our law as "solitary confinement." In that sense it is an unusual punishment, which is expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the state, which declares that cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted. Const. 1874, art. 2, § 9. That provision of the Constitution is directed against the cruel or unusual character of punishment, and not against the duration of the punishment. Ex parte Brady, 70 Ark. 376, 68 S. W. 34. And that provision applies to punishment for contempt. Ex parte Keeler, 45 S. C. 537, 31 L.R.A. 678, 55 Am. St. Rep. 785, 23 S. E. 865. The term "solitary confinement" is a relative one, and there is no way of knowing the precise extent to which it may be carried. A prisoner may be put in a cell to himself without being entirely excluded from communication, or he may be confined in a place so remote and under circumstances so peculiar that the severity of the punishment would be augmented to a very considerable degree. Misdemeanors are punishable in this state by fine or imprisonment, or both, and any other character of punishment must necessarily be regarded as unusual within the prohibition of the Constitution.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court for the confinement of appellant in jail as a punishment for the contempt, to begin before the expiration of his term in the penitentiary, is void; and also that any judgment of confinement in any unusual manner is prohibited. It follows from this that the order of the court setting aside the judgment was without authority, and the judgment of conviction stands as if it had not been set aside, and appellant must be remanded to the keepers of the penitentiary for confinement under that judgment.

The judgment for the contempt is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Annotation—Punishment of convict for failure or refusal to testify or other contempt.

WILLIAMS v. STATE, ante, 586, in declaring that a convict who has been brought into court may be compelled to testify and upon his refusal be punished, finds support in Newsum v. State (1885) 78 Ala. 407, which affirmed a judgment for contempt against a witness who refused to testify before the grand jury, he having been brought before the grand jury on order of the court, from prison, where he was undergoing sentence. The contention of this case was that the court had no power to impose a fine as the witness had not been subpoenaed; but the court held that a witness is subject to the penalty for contempt though not subpoenaed, where, being in prison, he is brought before the grand jury at their request by order of the court. The court stated that "it frequently happens that witnesses wanted before the grand jury are in prison, as this one was, and cannot be commanded by a subpoena. In such cases the custom is believed to be general, if not universal, to obtain from the court an order that the prisoner be carried before the grand jury, there to testify. We can perceive neither harm nor error in such practice."

The question involved in WILLIAMS v. STATE, as to the way or manner of punishing a convict who refuses to testify, does not seem to have been discussed in other reported cases.

The question of the authority of the court to compel or provide for the attendance of convicts as witnesses is not within the scope of this note. In this connection it is to be observed that the court in WILLIAMS v. STATE refused to discuss that point, stating that when a convict was brought before the court, by whatever means, it considered that it had the power to compel him to testify and to punish him for contempt for his refusal.

Garnishment — of bank deposit — dismissal — effect.

The dismissal of a proceeding in which a bank deposit had been garnished renders the deposit subject to check, although the bank has been notified of an intention to appeal, if no appeal has actually been taken or supersedeas bond given.

pel payment of money on deposit in the defendant bank. Affirmed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

The United Mine Workers of America, district 21, is a voluntary unincorporated association, composed of many members. The appellees were members of that organization, and appellee Douglas was its secretary and treasurer. We will hereafter, for convenience, designate the organization as the "district."

On September 1, 1914, the district had on deposit with the American National Bank, of Fort Smith, Arkansas, which, for convenience, we will hereafter designate "bank," the sum of $8,557.37. These funds were a general deposit and subject to the check of the district through Douglas, its treasurer. In September, 1914, the Coronado Coal Company sued the district in the United States district court for damages alleged to be due it on account of certain torts alleged to have been committed by the members of the district. Writs of garnishment and attachment were issued out of the district court and served on the bank on September 2, 1914. On October 20, 1915, the district court sustained a demurrer to the complaint of the coal company and entered a judgment dismissing same. On October 25, 1915, the United States court entered a judgment dismissing the attachment and the garnishment against the bank and discharging the bank. On October 27, 1915, the district drew its check on the bank and presented same for the full amount of its deposit, which the bank declined to pay, and the check was protested for nonpayment. On the same day the district instituted suit in the Sebastian circuit court for the money. The bank answered, admitting that it had on general deposit the amount of funds claimed by the district; but alleged that said check had not been paid for the reason that the writ of garnishment had been issued by the United States court in a suit pending in that court between the coal company and the district, whereby the bank was ordered to hold the funds subject to the orders and directions of the United States court, and that the bank had been informed that the Federal court had dismissed the action wherein the writ of garnishment was issued, but that before demand was made upon the bank for the payment of the check the coal company notified the bank that it had prayed an appeal from the judgment of the Federal court dismissing the garnishment, and that the appeal would be perfected within the time allowed by law, and that a supersedeas bond would be given in the Federal court, and that the coal company would hold the bank liable if it paid out the funds in its hands belonging to the district.

The president of the bank testified that the bank had declined to cash the check for the reason that a day or two before it was presented he had been notified by the attorneys for the coal company in the Federal court that an appeal would be taken immediately in that cause from the judgment of that court, and that a supersedeas bond would be given. The bank was notified that, in the event the money was paid out before their appeal could be perfected and before the appellate court could pass upon the judgment dismissing the action of the coal company, that the bank would be held liable by the coal company for the funds. He had not only been notified orally, but the bank had been served with written notice. That on the 28th of October, 1915, the attorneys for the coal company had served the bank with written notice that they were preparing to take an appeal or writ of error from the judgment rendered by the United States district court and to supersede the judgment, which appeal, in their opinion, would have the effect to hold the funds in the hands of the bank pending such appeal. He stated that the bank was L.R.A.1917B.

perfectly willing to pay over the funds to the district, but that its attorney had advised that it would not be safe to do so, and that the bank only wished to protect itself, and had no other interest in the funds; that it feared that it might have to pay the same twice.

One of the attorneys for the coal company testified that, as soon as he learned that demand had been made on the bank by the district for the payment of the funds which had been garnisheed, he notified the bank that the plaintiffs in the Federal court case had appealed from the judgment of that court dismissing the suit therein, and that he later handed to the attorney for the bank a letter to that effect; that he had been instructed by his clients, the plaintiffs in the Federal court case, to perfect the appeal immediately therein, and that he had notified the bank that the appeal would be perfected at the earliest possible moment, and supersedeas bond given for the purpose of tying up and holding the funds garnisheed and attached in the hands of the bank.

A certified copy of the judgment of the Federal court was introduced in evidence, showing that that court, on October 25, 1915, entered a judgment dismissing the writs of garnishment and attachment, and discharging the bank from said writs. The record also shows that "plaintiffs at the time requested the court to allow a reasonable time in which to present to the appellate court the question of tendering a supersedeas bond so as to hold the attachments and garnishments herein in their present status. This request the court denied, and the plaintiffs at the time excepted to the ruling of the court in discharging the attachments and garnishments, and also in the refusal of the court to allow the above named."

Upon the above facts the court rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs below, appellees here, for the full amount of their claim, and from that judgment this appeal comes.

Messrs. Hill, Brizzolara & Fitzhugh for appellants.

Messrs. Covington & Grant for appellees.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Lewis v. Faul, 29 Ark. 470, this court, speaking of the remedy by attachment and garnishment, said it "is, at best, an extraordinary and harsh remedy, in derogation of the common law, depending upon positive legislation for its existence, and he who invokes it must follow the law, at least in substance."

And in Giles v. Hicks, 45 Ark. 271, 276, we said: "Garnishment is a purely statutory proceeding, which cannot be pushed beyond the authority of the statute."

Our attention has not been directed to any statute, and we know of none, that authorizes the garnishee to hold funds in his hands belonging to the defendant in the action after judgment has been rendered dismissing the cause of action against the defendant and discharging the writ of garnishment. The effect of a judgment dismissing the cause of action against the defendant and discharging the writ of garnishment was to place the garnishee bank and the defendant district in the same relation that they sustained to each other before the writ of garnishment was served upon the bank. The bank, according to the undisputed proof, before the writ of garnishment was served, held the funds of the district as a general deposit, subject to the check of the district. Inasmuch, therefore, as it appears that no appeal had actually been taken from the judgment of the district court dismissing the writ of garnishment at the time the check of the district was presented to the bank for payment, the bank had no right to refuse such payment.

Of course, if an appeal had been actually taken from the judgment dismissing the writ of garnishment, or if a supersedeas bond had been given, then the bank would have been justified in refusing to cash the check, under the doctrine announced by this court in Harrison v. Trader, 29 Ark. 85. In that case, speaking of a lien by attachment, this court, quoting from Mr. Drake, on Attachments, said: "The dissolution of an attachment necessarily discharges from its lien the effects or credits on which it may have been executed, whether reduced to possession by the officer, or subjected in the hands of garnishees. When dissolved, the defendant is entitled to a return of the property on demand, unless the judgment of dissolution be suspended by writ of error or appeal. This, it is said, takes away the defendant's right to demand the property, and the officer, if he have notice of the writ of error or appeal, would not be justified in returning the property."

And further: "Our statute extends only to supersedeas of executions, all other features of the court's action are suspended by an appeal or writ of error; and if the cause is reversed, the rights of parties stand as though no action had ever taken place in the inferior court."

But the facts disclosed by this record are that at the time the district made demand on the bank for the payment of its check there was no appeal actually pending from the judgment dismissing the writ of garnishment; neither had there been any supersedeas bond filed, or any order of the district court suspending or superseding the effect of the judgment dismissing the writs of attachment and garnishment. On the contrary, the record here shows that the district court in which the judgment was rendered expressly refused to grant the plaintiffs in the action time in which to present a supersedeas bond. True, the testimony showed that at the time the district presented its check to the bank the latter had been notified that an appeal would be taken immediately from the judgment dismissing the writ of garnishment, and that same would be perfected and a supersedeas bond given for the purpose of holding the funds in statu quo. But this testimony only shows that an appeal had not in fact been taken, but was only contemplated, and that no supersedeas bond had been filed, and that, in fact, no order of the district court had been made suspending or superseding the judgment dismissing the writs of attachment and garnishment.

It thus appears that at the time the district presented its check to the bank for payment the bank occupied precisely the same relation to the district as it did before the writs were served.

In the absence of a statute prescribing that where a judgment has been entered dismissing a writ of garnishment and discharging the garnishee, that the garnishee may retain possession of the property of the defendant during the time allowed for an appeal, or until a reasonable time within that period has elapsed for the perfecting of the appeal or filing a supersedeas bond, the garnishee would have no authority under the law, and therefore no right, to deprive the defendant of the possession of his property.

In Sherrod v. Davis, 17 Ala. 312, it is said: "But after the judgment of the court is final and complete in favor of the defendant, unless it is superseded by writ of error or appeal, the right of the defendant to have the property restored to him is unquestionable, and it is therefore the duty of the sheriff, on demand, to deliver it to him."

See also 8 C. J. § 1091, note 83, and other cases there cited.

The necessary consequence of the judgment in favor of the district dismissing the cause of action against it and discharging the bank from the writs of attachment and garnishment was to restore to the district the right to check out the funds deposited by it with the bank; and it follows from what we have said that simple notice to the bank, that an appeal would be immediately prosecuted and supersedeas bond filed, would not justify the bank in refusing to pay over the money to the district.

The judgment of the Circuit Court so holding is therefore correct, and it is affirmed.

Annotation—Possibility of appeal from dismissal of garnishment or attachment as affecting right to withhold property from debtor.

There is a decided conflict among the authorities in those jurisdictions where in the question as to the length of time, if any, which property which has been garnished or attached must be held after dismissal of the writ for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to perfect an appeal, has been considered, some of the courts holding that the officer or garnishee, in the absence of direction by the court or controlling statutory provision, is not bound to retain the property, or, in other words, that the lien is not preserved unless an appeal from the order of dissolution is taken instantaneously, or the court directs that the property be held until an appeal can be perfected; other courts holding that the property must be held for a reasonable time, which is such a time as is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to take a prompt appeal; and one court, at least, holding that the appeal may be taken at any time during which an appeal in an ordinary case could be taken, which means that the property must be held until the expiration of the period prescribed by general statutory provisions relating to appeals, unless a delivery is sooner ordered by the court. These classes of cases will be taken up in the order enumerated.

Thus in Alabama, under statutes which are silent as to the possession and control of money which has been garnished after dismissal of the garnishment, it has been held (AMERICAN NAT. BANK v. DOUGLAS, ante, 588) that the dismissal of a proceeding in which a bank account had been garnished rendered the deposit subject to the order of the depositor although the garnishee bank had been notified by the plaintiff of an intention to appeal, no appeal having actually been taken or supersedeas bond issued before the presentation of the order to the bank.

And in Minnesota, where the statute is silent upon the question of the disposal of property after dismissal of an attachment, the case of Ryan Drug Co. v. Peacock (1889) 40 Minn. 470, 42 N. W. 298, involved the question as to the duty of the sheriff to retain the attached property after the dissolution of the writ so as to enable the plaintiff to determine whether he would appeal, and to perfect the appeal and stay if he decided to take that course; and it was expressly ruled that the officer was not bound to retain the property, the court saying: "As to what is the duty of the sheriff in respect to the attached property upon the dissolution of the attachment, Drake, Attachm. § 426, states the general rule that 'the special property of the officer in the attached effects is at an end, and he is bound to restore them to the defendant, if he is still the owner of them, or, if not, to the owner.' This is certainly the logical rule, for, the writ being his only authority for keeping the property from the owner, such authority is gone when the writ is dissolved. It is true that under our practice the plaintiff may, by appealing from the order dissolving the writ and giving the bond for a stay, suspend the operation of the order, and that such suspension will relate back to the date of the order, so that, if the officer still has the property, his right to hold it is restored; and it may also be, as between the parties to the writ, that, if between the date of the order and the appeal with a stay the sheriff has returned the property to the defendant, the appeal and stay reinstates the lien so that the plaintiff may require the sheriff to retake the property. Neither of these, however, is this case. Here the question is, Is it the duty of the sheriff to retain the property after the dissolution of the writ, which is his only warrant for holding it, to enable the plaintiff to determine whether he will appeal, and to perfect the appeal and stay, if he decides to take that course? The statute is silent on the point. If it be his duty to still hold the property, for how long must he hold it? Some authorities suggest that he should hold it for a reasonable time. But who is to determine what is a reasonable time? If that be the rule, the officer will be liable to the plaintiff in case he return the property to the defendant before the end of a reasonable time, and to the defendant in case he refuse to return it on demand after such reasonable time. The position of the officer would be a hard one if he must take the risk of the court or jury trying the action against him agreeing with him as to what is a reasonable time. We think it is for the plaintiff, and not the sheriff, to do what may be necessary to preserve the interests of the former in case of a dissolution of the writ. This he may do by procuring and serving on the officer an order directing him, in case the writ shall be dissolved, to retain the property, or staying the operation of the order dissolving in case it shall be made."

And in Alabama it has been held that where an attachment has been dissolved the debtor is entitled to his property and that the sheriff cannot lawfully withhold it from him unless the dissolution was actually superseded by the writ of error or appeal of which the sheriff had notice before the property was returned. Sherrod v. Davis (1850) 17 Ala. 312, quoted in AMERICAN NAT. BANK v. DOUGLAS, ante, 588, and holding that the sheriff was not liable for returning the property to the debtor after dismissal of the attachment but before a writ of error was sued out, notwithstanding the plaintiff procured a reversal of the judgment and ultimately a judgment in his favor.

So in Wisconsin it has been held (Stannard v. Youmans (1901) 110 Wis. 375, 85 N. W. 967) that a discharge of a garnishee protects him in disposing of the property after such attachment and before a reversal, unless the lien has been continued prior to such disposal by proper order or stay of proceedings pending an appeal.

And in Kansas a constable has no right to hold attached property between the rendition of a judgment in a justice of the peace court in defendant's favor, in which the property is ordered to be returned to the debtor, and the filing of an appeal bond, even if such a bond would carry the attachment proceeding to an appellate court,—which it is held it would not do, the statute providing that if judgment be rendered for defendant the garnishee should be discharged. Becker v. Steele (1889) 41 Kan. 173, 21 Pac. 169. And the same is true of similar proceedings in the district court, unless the court orders that the lien be preserved pending proceedings in error, as by statute it has the power to do. Miller v. Dixon (1895) 2 Kan. App. 445, 42 Pac. 1014, holding that the debtor could transfer a good title to the attached property after the attachment was dissolved, the court not having ordered that the lien be preserved.

Somerindyke (1856) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 199, it was held that where an attachment was issued it was the duty of the officer to take the property and keep the same to satisfy any judgment that might be recovered on an attachment, but that as soon as defendant obtained judgment the right to retain the goods ceased and the defendant in attachment was entitled upon demand to have them restored to his possession irrespective of any appeal or right of appeal; but this evidently was upon the theory that even a reversal of judgment would not restore the lien, but that a new action to enforce the claim would be necessary.

And upon this phase of the question see Harrison v. Trader (1874) 29 Ark. 85, which quotes with approval from Drake on Attachments, §§ 411, 412. This case and the provisions quoted from Drake are in turn quoted in the AMERICAN NAT. BANK CASE, ante, 588.

As before stated, some decisions in effect lay down the rule that property should be retained a reasonable length of time after dismissal of a writ of garnishment or attachment, so as to enable the plaintiff, if he so desires, to perfect an appeal or writ of error. Thus in Iowa it has been held that as between the immediate parties the property must be retained a reasonable time, during which the plaintiff may appeal. Danforth v. Carter (1856) 4 Iowa, 230, holding that attached property was still liable, although it was returned to the debtor after dismissal of the attachment but before an appeal was taken, such appeal having been taken four days after the dismissal of the writ and within the term. The court in this case, in answering the question whether the officer must wait indefinitely to see whether an appeal would be taken before returning the attached property, said that he must wait only a reasonable time, the plaintiff being required to perfect his appeal "forthwith" or lose all right to same, and that if the defendant desired an immediate return of the property the proper procedure was to notify the other party and move the court for such a return. But the rule is otherwise in Iowa where the rights of third parties to the attached property are involved. Thus in Danforth v. Rupert (1861) 11 Iowa, 547, which was an action against the clerk of the court to recover money paid by him to defendant in attachment proceeding after dissolution of an attachment but before an appeal therefrom was taken, the court held that the clerk was a third party within the meaning of the decision in Danforth v. Carter. (Iowa) supra, and upheld the following instruction: "The question for the jury to decide is, whether the defendant, Rupert, at the time he paid the money to Bissell [the debtor] did it under such circumstances as render him liable therefor in this action. If defendant knew, at the time he so paid it over, that the plaintiffs in the original attachment suit, Danforth, Davis & Company, were about to supersede the judgment of the district court dismissing the attachment, by an appeal to the Supreme Court, or if he had reasonable grounds for such a belief, in either event it would be your duty to find for the plaintiffs. On the other hand, if Rupert paid the money over in good faith, without any ground for such belief, and because the district court had dissolved the attachment, then your verdict should be for the defendant;" saying, "it is true that the safest and most correct course would be for the clerk to obtain an order of court directing him to pay over the money before so doing. Yet we cannot say that he is liable if he does pay over the money in good faith, after the attachment has been dissolved, the suit ended, and without any notice of an appeal given. Is it not the duty of the plaintiff, whose attachment has been dissolved, to be vigilant, if he desires his cause to stand in statu quo? The ruling is against him, and he is the only one who can determine whether it is final or not. Had the plaintiffs, who were the only parties interested in having the money remain in the clerk's hands, notified him that they had appealed, and after such notice the defendant had parted with the money, he would have been liable." Later in Iowa, by virtue of a statutory provision, the lien of an attachment was preserved for two days after dismissal, during which the plaintiff could appeal, provided he announced, at the time the order discharging the attachment was made, his purpose to appeal therefrom. See Ryan v. Heenan (1889) 76 Iowa, 589, 41 N. W. 367, construing and applying Iowa Code, § 3019. And upon the point that an appeal must be made promptly, i. e., within a reasonable time, to preserve the lien of a dissolved attachment, see the dissenting opinion of Biggs, J., in Newman v. York (1898) 74 Mo. App. 292, which is set out in the following paragraph.

In Missouri it has been held (Newman v. York (Mo.) supra, that the plaintiff upon dissolution of an attachment has the full time allowed by law for taking appeals in ordinary cases, and that it is the duty of the officer having the property in his possession, if timely notified by plaintiff of an intention to appeal, to hold the property until the plaintiff has had time and opportunity to perfect such an appeal. However, Biggs, J., strongly dissented from this ruling, he maintaining that the officer was only bound to retain the property for a reasonable time so as to enable the plaintiff to take a prompt appeal, and that whether an appeal is perfected within a reasonable time under the circumstances is a question for the jury.

Under statute.

In a considerable number of jurisdictions, the statutes which created the right to procure a writ of attachment or garnishment also have provisions relating to the disposal of property involved after a dismissal of the writ, some of which, as is shown by the adjudications, are instructive upon the question under consideration in this annotation.

Thus in Nebraska it is expressly provided, by statute relating to "the retention of attached property pending a review on error of an order discharging the attachment," that "when an order discharging an order of attachment is made, and any party affected thereby shall except thereto, the court or judge shall fix the number of days, not to exceed twenty, in which such party may file a petition in error, during which time the property attached shall be held by the sheriff or other officer." Under this statute the court upon dissolving an attachment may fix a time, not exceeding twenty days, in which to file a petition in error and to give the required undertaking, during which time the property must be held by the officer having possession of same without any undertaking having been given; but if no undertaking is given within the required period the officer must deliver the property to the person entitled to same. State ex rel. Rieschick v. Cunningham (1879) 9 Neb. 146, 1 N. W. 1011, construing Neb. Act February 17, 1873, and holding that the debtor could compel the return of the property where an undertaking was not filed within the twenty-day period. And see Adams County Bank v. Morgan (1889) 26 Neb. 148, 41 N. W. 993, construing Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 236e, and holding that a failure to file an undertaking within twenty days of the dissolution of an attachment destroys the attachment lien; and McDonald v. Bowman (1894) 40 Neb. 269, 58 N. W. 704, applying Code Civ. Proc. §§ 236e and 236f, and holding that the officer must in a proper case retain the attached property during the twenty days allowed for the perfecting of a writ of error.

And for a statute allowing a two-day period for the perfecting of an appeal, see the provisions set out in connection with Ryan v. Heenan (Iowa) supra.

And a number of statutes merely direct that upon dismissal of the writ the money or other property must be delivered to the debtor, which provisions, it is generally held, must be complied with, the attachment or garnishment being merely a creature of the statute.

Thus in Loveland v. Alvord Consol. Quartz Min. Co. (1888) 76 Cal. 562, 18 Pac. 682, it was held that a defendant was entitled to make any disposition of attached property which he saw fit after the dissolution of the attachment, and this irrespective of any appeal or right of appeal, under the statute providing that after judgment for defendant all proceeds of sale and money collected by the sheriff and all the property attached remaining in the sheriff's hands shall be delivered to the defendant, there being no express provisions allowing the sheriff to retain the property after judgment for defendant, and no provisions allowing his retaining of it pending an appeal from judgment. So in Ranft v. Young (1893) 21 Nev. 401, 32 Pac. 490, it was held that a statute directing a return upon judgment being obtained for defendant released the property from the moment the judgment was rendered, and that upon a refusal of the sheriff to return it he was answerable in an action of trover even though there was a motion for a new trial pending, there being no provision in the statute authorizing the sheriff to retain the property after judgment in favor of defendant was entered. And in First State Bank v. Jones (1910) 60 Tex. Civ. App. 523, 139 S. W. 671, on subsequent appeal in (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 140 S. W. 116, a Texas statute (Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 216) which provided that upon vacation of an attachment "the court shall make the proper order making disposal of the property or the proceeds of the sale thereof, if the same has been sold under order of the court, directing that it be turned over to the defendant," was held to make it the duty of the court to order the return of the attached property when it yet remains in the custody L.R.A.1917B.

of the officer, of the attaching officer to carry the order into effect, and of the debtor to receive the property. And in the Wisconsin cases of Clark v. Lamoureux (1888) 70 Wis. 508, 36 N. W. 393; Morawitz v. Wolf (1888) 70 Wis. 515, 36 N. W. 392; and Evans v. Virgin (1888) 72 Wis. 423, 7 Am. St. Rep. 870, 39 N. W. 864, § 2764 of the Revised Statutes, which provided that upon dismissal of an attachment "an order shall be entered that the property attached be forthwith delivered up to the defendant," was held to be imperative even though it would be inoperative, as where possession had already been obtained; but in the Evans Case it was also held that an order made pursuant to the statute was sufficiently complied with by a payment of the proceeds of the attached property to execution creditors of the debtor. And in Hey v. Harding (1904) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1454, 78 S. W. 136, the court construed Ky. Code, § 228, providing that upon discharge of an attachment the property attached or its proceeds shall be returned to the defendant, and § 747, providing that an appeal shall not stay proceedings upon judgment unless supersedeas be issued, holding that a judgment discharging an attachment entitled the defendant to a return of the attached property or its proceeds and that such a return could be made at any time before a supersedeas was issued. And see Bowe v. Wilkins (1884) 1 How Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 21, which quotes a similar New York statute (Code, § 709), which was held inapplicable to the then present case (but in connection with the Bowe Case see Henry v. Salisbury (1898) 33 App. Div. 293, 53 N. Y. Supp. 834, 6 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 182, for a later New York statute, which provided for a stay of proceedings and the suspension of the effect of an annulment pending an appeal on which a reversal would revive the warrant); and Jackson v. Burnett (1896) 119 N. C. 195, 25 S. E. 868, which construed N. C. Code, § 373, which provided that upon discharge of an attachment the attached property shall be delivered to the defendant.

And it seems that where the statute directs a return, even the court has no power to continue the lien so as to justify the withholding of the property from the debtor pending an appeal, at least unless statutory authority is given. Primm v. Superior Ct. (1906) 3 Cal. App. 208, 84 Pac. 786.

But statutes providing that upon dissolution of an attachment the property shall be returned to the defendant do not apply to cases where there has been a sale or transfer of defendant's interest in the property subsequent to levying of attachment, and in such case the property should be delivered to the true owner. Jackson v. Burnett (1896) 119 N. C. 195, 25 S. E. 868.

And a preservation of the lien and a consequent justification for the retention of property by the sheriff may be provided for by statute. See Primm v. Superior Ct (Cal.) supra, wherein Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 946, which provided that the lien of an attachment may be preserved after judgment for defendant by the perfecting of an appeal and the filing of a proper undertaking, was under consideration, it being held that the fact that the statute prevented the immediate return of property to defendant did not deprive him of his property without due process of law; Hey v. Harding (Ky.) supra, wherein Ky. Code, § 747, which is set out supra, was construed, it being held that a supersedeas issued after the return of property held by a sheriff under attachment to the debtor upon dismissal of the attachment had no retroactive effect upon the validity of the return.

And under the Wisconsin statutes it would seem that immediate notice of an appeal from dismissal of attachment would serve to warrant the withholding of the property; see Meloy v. Orton (1890) 42 Fed. 513, construing Wis. Rev. Stat. § 3061, which provided in effect that where a party shall give immediate notice of appeal from an order vacating or modifying a writ of attachment he may within three days serve an undertaking to save defendant harmless, and that upon the giving of such an undertaking the court shall continue the attachment. ED KIMBOL

v.

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION.

(— Cal. —, 160 Pac. 150.)

Master and servant — workmen's compensation — injury by fall of ceiling — arising out of employment.

Injury to a dishwasher in a restaurant from the fall of the ceiling due to the act of the occupant of the floor above, over which the restaurant keeper had no control, but which made the working place unsafe, arises out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. a, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(Henshaw, Lorigan, and Melvin, JJ., dissent.)

(September 20, 1916.)

Note. — The general subject of workmen's compensation acts is treated comprehensively in the annotation in L.R.A.1916A, 23. The American cases on the question as to what injuries are deemed to arise out of and in the course of the employment are dealt with at pages 232 et seq. of that annotation, and the English cases on the subject at pages 40 et seq.

For later annotation and cases on questions arising under these acts, consult the L.R.A. Digest and Indexes to Notes covering volumes subsequent to L.R.A.1916A, under the title "Workmen's Compensation." L.R.A.1917B.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to claimant, in a proceeding by him under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to recover compensation for injuries sustained while in petitioner's employ. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Boyer & Beach for petitioner.

Mr. Christopher M. Bradley for respondents:

The injury suffered by the applicant arose out of his employment.

Angellotti, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to one Fred Douglas against petitioner, Ed Kimbol, for injuries received by him by accident in the course of his employment by said Kimbol, and alleged and found to have arisen out of said employment.

There is no doubt that the injury to Douglas was sustained "by accident," within the meaning of our Workmen's Compensation Law, and admittedly the accident happened "in the course of the employment." Our act requiring as an essential to compensation that the injury must not only be received in the course of the employment, but must also arise out of the employment (§ 12), the claim is that the injury here did not arise out of the employment within the meaning of our act. A divided Commission has found against this claim. There is no dispute as to the material facts.

Kimbol was the owner of and was conducting a restaurant business on the ground floor of a building in Los Angeles. Douglas was in his employ as a dishwasher. While working as such, the floor immediately above the place where he was at work suddenly gave way, with the result that he was struck by some falling object or objects and injured. The giving way of this floor was due to the fact that it was overloaded, a large quantity of bottled grape juice having been stored thereon. This floor was not included in the lease under which Kimbol occupied that portion of the building devoted to restaurant purposes, and he had no control whatever thereof; nor did he have any knowledge that the floor above was being used for storage purposes. It was in fact rented for a rooming or lodging house, and the lease contained a clause that it should not be used for any other purpose. Under these circumstances, can it fairly be held that the injury arose out of the employment?

The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts has said, in regard to the meaning of the term, "arising out of the employment," as used in Workmen's Compensation Laws: "It [the injury] 'arises out of' the employment when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. Under this test, if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work and to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment, then it arises 'out of' the employment. But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause and which comes from a hazard to which the workman would have been equally exposed apart from the employment. The causative danger must be peculiar to the work, and not common to the neighborhood. It must be incidental to the character of the business, and not independent of the relation of master and servant. It need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, L.R.A.1917B.

and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 498, L.R.A.1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522.

This appears to us to be a good general definition of the term "arising out of the employment," and we think it fairly includes such a case as this. It will be conceded, in view of the facts we have stated, that the place in which Douglas was employed was not an unsafe place in the sense that there was any structural defect therein likely to cause injury so long as the building was used for the purposes for which it was intended, and that the danger of a collapse of the ceiling of the restaurant and the collapse of such ceiling were due wholly to the unauthorized use by another of the floor above for storage purposes, and the consequent subjection of that floor to a greater burden than that for which it was designed; but because of this unauthorized use of the floor above for storage purposes those below were, in fact, in danger of injury from a collapse of the floor, and in that sense the place in which Douglas was required to do all his work was an unsafe place. The danger was one peculiar to that very place—an incident of the particular premises used as they were being used—and it is not unreasonable to say that Douglas was specially exposed to that danger by reason of his employment. Solely by reason of and in pursuance of such employment he was required to remain in this unsafe place exposed to this danger of a collapse of the ceiling of the room in which he was constantly at work. The risk was normally one incident to working in that place, one due solely to its unsafe condition. If this be so, we are of the opinion that the injury may fairly be said, in view of the authorities, to have arisen out of his employment. All the circumstances being considered, there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the work was required to be performed and the injury. The resulting injury was a natural incident of the work in view of the conditions under which it was being done, one that would have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment. The danger was peculiar to the particular place in which the employee was required to work. It is true that the accident was not actually foreseen or expected, but this is not necessary. It is sufficient that after the event it appears to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence.

The question of special exposure by reason of the employment has been considered in various cases. The general rule deducible therefrom is that, if the exposure of the employee to a particular danger differs substantially from the normal risk to which all are subject, if the employment necessarily accentuates and increases the danger to a higher degree than that to which persons generally are subjected, then it may fairly be held that there was such special exposure to such danger as warrants a conclusion that the accident arose out of the employment, even though unexpected or unusual and in no way actually anticipated. See Martin v. John Lovibond & Sons (English Court of Appeals) 5 N. C. C. A. 985, and note, [1914] 2 K. B. 227, 6 B. R. C. 466, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 78, 83 L. J. K. B. N. S. 806, 110 L. T. N. S. 455, 7 B. W. C. C. 243; Hoening v. Industrial Commission, 159 Wis. 646, L.R.A.1916A, 339, 150 N. W. 996, 8 N. C. C. A. 192; State ex rel. People's Coal & Ice Co. v. District Ct. 120 Minn. 502, L.R.A.1916A, 344, 153 N. W. 119, 9 N. C. C. A. 129; Adamson v. George Anderson & Co. [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 306, 2 Scot. L. T. 139.

It seems clear that this case is one in which the accident and injury to Douglas can fairly be held to have "arisen out of the employment" within the meaning of that term as it is defined in McNicol's Case, supra, and the other authorities cited herein, and that the conclusion of the Accident Commission to that effect must therefore be sustained. As we have seen, it can make no difference that the danger was not known or anticipated; nor can it make any difference that the employer was entirely without fault. The liability for compensation created by our law is not founded on any want of care on the part of the employer; nor is it material that the dangerous condition of the place in which Douglas was working was due entirely to the fault of some third party. The room in which Douglas was required to do this work had become an unsafe place in which to be because of the danger of a collapse of the ceiling thereof, and solely by reason of his employment in that unsafe place he was specially exposed to such danger. We have said that an accident arises "out of the employment" where "it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employee's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employee," and that "it 'arises out of' the occupation when there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the servant works and the resulting injury." Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, — Cal. —, L.R.A.1916F, 1164, 158 Pac. 212. The italics are ours. Under the facts we apparently have here a risk to which the employer's business specially exposed the employee. The danger was a constant one, inherent in the place itself under the conditions there existing, and the injury was one which a person cognizant of those conditions would reasonably expect to occur.

It has always been the law that it is the duty of the employer to use reasonable care to furnish an employee a safe place in which to do his work. If for any reason, whether due to the negligent, or even criminal, act of a third party or not, the place was in fact unsafe, the employer was liable to the employee for any injury due thereto, provided that if he had used reasonable care in the matter he would have known of the defect and would have remedied it. The condition as to the safety of the place in which the work was to be done is thus always a matter incident to the employment, and an injury arising from its unsafe condition has always been considered an injury arising out of the employment.

Under the old law, the employer's exemption from liability where he was not negligent in the matter existed solely because he was not negligent, and not because the injury did not arise out of the employment. Our industrial compensation system has dispensed altogether with the element of negligence on the part of the employer, but it still must remain true that injury to an employee which is due to the dangerous condition of the very room in which he is required to do his work is an injury resulting from a "risk reasonably incident to the employment." Of course, there is no analogy between such a case as this and such cases as Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, and Fishering v. Pillsbury, — Cal. —, 158 Pac. 215, in which it is held that there is no liability on the part of the employer to the employee for an injury inflicted by the "skylarking" of a fellow employee, because such an injury does not arise out of the employment.

In view of the suggestion as to the impossibility of the employer insuring against such an accident as this, it is proper to observe that if, as we hold, the injury did arise out of the employment, it was one that would be covered by a policy insuring against liability for injuries to employees received in the course of employment and arising out of the employment.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: Shaw, J.; Sloss, J.; Lawlor, J.

Henshaw, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The case is the first of its kind before this court, and, because in my judgment the award is supported by an altogether strained and unwarranted extension of the language and meaning of our law, it has seemed to me fitting that I should express my views at length.

It is a part of familiar knowledge that the fundamentals of our Compensation Act are taken from the English law,—a law which had been in existence for many years before the enactment of the similar measure by this state. The phrases of paramount and controlling importance in measuring the right to an award, namely, that the injury must have been sustained “in the course of the employment,” and also must have “arisen out of the employment,” are adopted bodily from the English law. As is to be expected, these phrases, as applied to accidents and injuries, came frequently before the English courts for interpretation. With only the latter of the two are we here concerned. Admittedly in this case, the injury was sustained while the employee was properly engaged in his labors. The one question calling for answer is whether, within the language and spirit of our law, it can be said that the accident “arose out of the employment.”

In considering the vast number of cases that have arisen and continue to arise under the terms of the English act and of the similar enactments adopted by our states, it will not create surprise to find amongst them extreme cases, and very doubtful cases. This is inevitably to be expected, since the jurists called upon to consider these acts are jurists trained in the principles of the common law, from which principles these acts are a wide departure, and also because these jurists are called upon to construe and to apply to these new conditions new phrases of description and definition. Nevertheless, in no one of these numerous adjudications which has passed under my review is there to be found any support for the extreme construction which is here given to our law in support of this award.

In so declaring, I accept unreservedly the definition of the Massachusetts court in McNicol's Case, which is adopted in the prevailing opinion, as being satisfactory and complete. But to my mind the very terms of that definition, in which the prevailing opinion finds support for this award, actually forbid it. I say this quite realizing the fact that my statement is necessarily a reflection upon my own powers of reasoning and understanding, or else that the language of the Massachusetts court furnishes a striking illustration of the grave limitations of English written words to convey exact thought.

acts design to accomplish. They were enacted under the sanction of the police power because it was believed that direct provision should be made for the support of an employee whose injuries grew out of his work, and for the maintenance of his family and dependents where, under similar conditions, his injuries resulted in his death; and it was decreed that the employer—the industry—in all such cases should bear the burden of this compensation, the employer in some cases being allowed, in other cases being compelled, to insure against the losses which might arise from these causes. Elsewhere I have pointed out that the interest of the state in seeing that an injured workman receives compensation during the period of his incapacity is just as great whether that workman be injured in his hours of leisure or in his hours of labor, and equally that the loss to the workman and the economic loss to the state are just as great if the workman be injured in his hours of leisure as if he be injured in his hours of labor. Nevertheless, these laws limit their beneficence with much rigidity to injuries received by the employee during his hours of labor, which injuries must also arise “out of the employment.” If this last phrase, “arise out of the employment,” means any injury, not wilfully occasioned by the employee himself, which he sustains because as an employee he is working at a given place,—and this unquestionably is the meaning of the prevailing decision,—then there was no occasion for the law-makers to have used this phrase at all; for that construction is the exact equivalent of saying that a workman shall be compensated for any injury which he sustains during the course of his employment, or, in other words, while at work.

In the broadest sense, whenever accident and consequent injury befall a workman who is duly in the performance of his duties, it may be said that such accident and injury arose “out of his employment.” But some of them arise out of the employment only because of the fact that by virtue of his employment the workman was at a given place at the given time when the accident happened. Is this latter class of accidents included within the meaning of our law? The prevailing opinion holds that it is. I am convinced that it is not. I construe our law to embrace only that class of injuries which may for convenience be described as “occupational injuries,” precisely as we use the phrase, “occupational diseases.” To this broad class belong all injuries which result to an employee from the performance of his work, even though occasioned by his own negligent performance of it. Second, all of those injuries resulting to the employee with or without negligence on his part, because of the employer's failure to perform some duty which he owes to his employee. And in this large class belong all of those cases where injury results from unsafe and inadequate appliances, place of labor, etc. And, third, all of those injuries resulting from extra hazard either inherent in the character of the labor or occasioned by the act of the employer.

Into one of these three classes must fall every injury for which compensation may properly be awarded, or otherwise there is no limitation whatsoever to the right of an award if the employee has been injured while at his labors. But it will not be disputed that our law does not grant compensation for every injury sustained while the employee is engaged in his labors. For example, it is not questioned that, saving in exceptional cases hereinafter distinguished, the employee is not entitled to compensation for injuries sustained by the so-called acts of God. Indeed, this was very early held and decided by our accident commissioners in Fensler v. Acc. Com. 1 Cal. Ind. Accd. Com. Dec. No. 21, p. 41. There an employee engaged in piling and unpling bags of cement in a warehouse on a hot day was overcome by heat; and, after laying down the general principle that the employer is not liable for accidents occurring by the act of God, it was found that his employee was especially exposed by his employment to the danger of sunstroke, and that his injury was therefore compensable, thus following the unbroken line of authority of the English and American courts; nor yet, saving in exceptional cases, is an injury compensable which is occasioned by the tortious act of a fellow employee, or the tortious or negligent act of a stranger.

Touching injuries arising from the act of God, it is said by Mr. Ruegg (Ruegg's Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation, 8th ed. p. 338): "The question has arisen, Could an operation of the laws of nature, as earthquake, flood, lightning, or extraordinary tempest, occasioning personal injury to a workman whilst engaged in his employment, be said to be 'accident arising out of and in the course of the employment?' It is thought not. It may be granted that, but for the fact of his being engaged in the employment at the time, the accident would not have happened to him. In this sense it may be said to have happened to him in the course of his employment. But in what fair sense could it be held to have arisen out of the employment? The employment may have been a cause sine qua non, but we do not think it could L.R.A.1917B.

As illustrating the application of the principle, and the exception to its application, may be cited Kelly v. Kerry County Council, 42 Ir. L. T. 23, where a workman, engaged in cleaning out gullies to prevent the road from being flooded, was struck by lightning and killed. Compensation was denied him, the judge saying: "I am unable to find any special or peculiar danger from lightning to which these men were exposed from working on the road. . . . It is only under very special circumstances, when the employment of the workman exposes him to peculiar risk from lightning, not shared by men in other employments, that an accident by lightning can be said to arise out of his employment."

The same principle was declared by the supreme court of Michigan in overruling an award granted by the Michigan Industrial Accident Board in Klawinski v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 185 Mich. 643, L.R.A.1916A, 342, 152 N. W. 213. Klawinski was a section laborer. During a violent storm, under directions of the foreman of the gang, all took refuge in a barn. A bolt of lightning struck the barn and killed Klawinski. It was conceded that he met his death in the course of his employment, but it was held that his death did not occur by reason of an accident arising out of his employment. Such also was the ruling of the supreme court of Wisconsin in Hoenig v. Industrial Commission, 159 Wis. 646, L.R.A.1916A, 330, 150 N. W. 996, 8 N. C. C. A. 102, where Hoenig was killed by a stroke of lightning while working on a dam in the Fox river. The Industrial Accident Commission, notwithstanding the introduction of certain testimony seeking to show that a workman so employed was exposed to an extra hazard from lightning, declined to consider the evidence sufficient to establish this extra hazard and refused to grant an award. The judgment of the Commission was sustained by the supreme court. Upon the other hand, the exceptional case where an award from death by lightning has been sustained because of the extra hazard growing out of the special occupation are typified by Andrew v. Falls-worth Industrial Soc. [1904] 2 K. B. 32, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 511, 68 J. P. 409, 52 Week. Rep. 451, 90 L. T. N. S. 611, 20 Times L. R. 429, 6 W. C. C. 11, where a bricklayer was killed by lightning while working on a scaffold 23 feet above the level of the ground. Expert evidence was given, showing that his position exposed the deceased to extra hazard and special danger from lightning. The county court held under this showing that compensation should be allowed, and the award was sustained for the indicated reasons. Such also was the decision of the supreme court of Minnesota in State ex rel. People's Coal & Ice Co. v. District Ct. 129 Minn. 502, L.R.A.1916A, 344, 153 N. W. 119, 9 N. C. C. A. 129, under certiorari to review an award, where the driver of an ice company, compelled by his duties to be out in stormy weather, left his team and went toward a tall tree, either for protection, or in the performance of his duties soliciting orders. He was killed by a bolt of lightning. The authorities are reviewed and the award sustained on the ground of the unusual risk and special hazard.

It will be instructive at this point to consider other cases where the question of extra hazard pertaining to the employment has been considered and the claim allowed or disallowed. In Armitage v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 778, 66 J. P. 613, 86 L. T. N. S. 883, 18 Times L. R. 648, the accident happened to a workman engaged in his work, through the wilful wrongful act of a fellow workman, and it was held the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. Falconer v. London & G. Engineering & Iron Ship Building Co. 3 F. 564, 38 Scot. L. R. 381, 8 Scot. L. T. 430, arose under the following facts: The accident befell a workman through the negligence of a fellow workman who was indulging in horseplay, and it was held that the accident did not arise in the course of his employment. To the same effect are our own cases. In Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, — Cal. —, L.R.A.1916A, 1164, 158 Pac. 212, an employee going down a flight of stairs in the performance of his duties, was tickled by a fellow employee. He fell and seriously injured his knee. Compensation was denied him upon the ground that the injury was not from an accident arising out of the employment, or incidental to the employment. To the same effect is Fishering v. Pillsbury, — Cal. —, 158 Pac. 215, where an employee lost the sight of an eye by a missile fired into it from a trick camera operated by a fellow employee in sport. In the first of these cases this court accepts the unquestioned rule, so frequently noted above, that the injury must be the result of a "risk reasonably incident to the employment." Upon the other hand, in Challis v. London & S. W. R. Co. [1905] 2 K. B. 154, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 569, 53 Week. Rep. 613, 93 L. T. N. S. 330, 21 Times L. R. 486, 7 W. C. C. A. 23, an engine driver received injuries resulting in his death through being struck by a stone thrown from a railway bridge at his engine by a malicious boy.

Here Collins, Master of the Rolls, uses the phrase so often found in the decisions, "a risk incidental to the employment," and his exposition clearly shows the meaning with which he employs these words; for he says that an accident arising out of an employment necessarily involves the consideration of the question, "What risks are commonly incidental to the particular employment in question?" And it is held that the temptation of boys to throw stones, whether done maliciously or heedlessly, is so well known that the risk to which the engine driver was exposed from this source was an extra hazard of his business, even though it were not a hazard common to other businesses. And this is exemplified by the language of Cozens-Hardy, Master of the Rolls, in Craske v. Wigan [1909] 2 K. B. 635, where, discussing the Challis Case, he says: "That case really turned on this: That there was evidence which satisfied the county court judge that there was an irresistible temptation to small boys to drop stones onto a train as it passes under a railway bridge. In that case a boy dropped a stone which hit the glass of the cab of the engine where the driver was, with the result that the fragments of glass were driven into his eye. We there held that that was a risk incidental to his employment. To quote a few words from my own judgment in that case. I said: 'It seems to be that the risk of such an occurrence is one which may reasonably be looked upon as incidental to the employment of an engine driver, though it might not be incidental to other employments.'"

The principle that only risks incidental to the service are covered by the act stood established as the interpretation of the English law long before and at the time our own act, with identical language, was adopted. Wilson v. Laing [1909] S. C. 1230, 46 Scot. L. R. 843. This condition, namely, that the accident is incidental to the employment, must be found to exist in all cases, even those where the award is based upon the exceptional hazard. Thus in Rowland v. Wright [1909] 1 K. B. 963, 77 L. J. K. B. S. 1071, 99 L. T. N. S. 758, 24 Times L. R. 852, known as the Stable Cat Case, a stableman, in the recognized discharge of his duty, was taking his meal quietly in the stable, when the cat, without any provocation, flew at him and bit him. The cat was the proprietor's cat. It remained in and about the stable at the instance of the proprietor. For it and its conduct he was held responsible. His employees were thus subject to this extra hazard at the instance of the employer, and the injury which resulted to this one thus became incidental to his employment, the court, in discussing the case in Craske v. Wigan, supra, declaring that "the stable cat was really a part of the furniture of the stable. . . . That was just as much an accident arising out of his employment as if he had been kicked or bitten by a horse in the stable."

In Nisbet v. Rayne [1910] 2 K. B. 639, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 84, 103 L. T. N. S. 178, 26 Times L. R. 632, 64 Sol. Jo. 719, 3 B. W. C. C. 507, 3 N. C. C. A. 268, a cashier was traveling in a railway carriage to a colliery, with a large sum of money for the payment of his employer's workmen. He was robbed and murdered. It was held that he was the victim of an accident within the meaning of the law, and that the extra hazard which he underwent in carrying this large sum of money was "a risk incident to his employment and likely to have been in the contemplation of the parties when Nisbet was engaged," Cozens-Hardy, Master of the Rolls, affirming this view upon appeal, and declaring that Nisbet was exposed to this special risk incidental to his employment. The same view was taken and principle announced in Anderson v. Balfour [1910] 2 I. R. 97, 44 Ir. L. T. 168, 3 B. W. C. C. 588, where a gamekeeper was attacked by poachers. Notwithstanding the act of the poachers was criminal, it was held that this extra hazard to which the gamekeeper was exposed was incidental to his occupation. It is a generally accepted principle that risks to which all persons similarly situated are equally exposed are not risks incident to the business.

Having thus pointed out certain exceptions distinguishing those engaged in particular employments and exempting them from the operation of the rule upon the ground of a special hazard incident to the employment, another class of cases now merits mention. The ordinary perils of a highway or of a crowded street are common to all upon the highway or street. Yet it is held that, where the nature of one's employment compels his continuous presence on and use of the streets, and even, perhaps, where a special and particular service requires his presence upon a street for a limited time, if injured he becomes entitled to compensation, but always upon the same ground of the special hazard incident to the business. Thus a collector was kicked by a passing horse while riding in the street on his bicycle in the course of his employment, and was allowed compensation for the indicated reason. M'Neice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co. 48 Scot. L. R. 15. To like effect, in Millar v. Refuge Assur. Co. 49 Scot. L. R. 67. And in Martin v. John Lovibond & Sons, 5 N. C. C. A. 985, a drayman, whose duties took him into the street for many continuous hours while going his proper rounds, stopped outside a public house, left his dray, crossed the street, drank a glass of ale, and recrossing the street to his dray was run over and killed. The English court of appeal, first declaring that the drayman was still in his employment during this temporary absence for refreshment, held that the street risk that he ran was incidental to his employment, and that his hazard, since he practically spent his life upon the streets, was exceptional, and that he was "exceptionally exposed to street accidents; . . . whereas an ordinary member of the public not so exceptionally exposed would not be entitled to claim compensation." This principle was declared by the California Accident Commission in Leary v. Fairchild, Gilmore, etc., Co. (vol. 1, No. 3), where Leary, engaged in repairing pavements in the street, was struck by an auto truck. And finally, touching the proposition that it is not necessary that one's occupation should demand his continued presence upon the street, but that the same principle would apply to one who was required to be upon the street in the performance of some specially delegated duty, it is sufficient to refer to Elliott, Workmen's Compensation Act, 6th ed. p. 78, and to the language of Cozens-Hardy in McDonald v. The Banana [1908] 2 K. B. 926, where he says: "If I send my domestic servant in the evening with a letter to a friend, and he is knocked down by a motor omnibus on his way to or from my friend's house, I should be liable. If, however, he, having a night off, goes—as he is at full liberty to go—to the Franco-British Exhibition for his own amusement, and meets with an accident at the same spot, I take it that I should not be liable."

I have heretofore said that all injuries to be compensable under our act must, in a broad sense, be occupational injuries, and that in the first subdivision will naturally fall all those injuries resulting to an employee and growing out of his performance of the work, even though the accident has its origin in his own negligent performance of it. The precise kind of accident or character of injury which an employee may thus sustain is immaterial, and the fact that it may be unusual or exceptional in character is equally immaterial. Thus in the case at bar, if this dishwasher had carelessly slopped water upon the floor and made it slippery, and then, taking up a knife for the purpose of cleaning it, had slipped and wounded himself with the knife, the accident would have been exceptional and unusual in character. But it would have arisen strictly out of the performance, though the negligent performance, on his duty. No one, I take it, will question the soundness of this classification, nor of the right of the employee to compensation for any injury so arising.

As little doubt can be entertained over the soundness of the second classification,—the right of the employee to compensation where the employer has failed in a duty owing to the employee for this is but one of the forms of the familiar common-law right of action. It is within this class, as I read the prevailing opinion, that the accident to Douglas is placed. It calls for detailed consideration later. The third class, entitling the employee to compensation when the injury results either from an extra hazard inherent in the character of the labor or occasioned by the act of the employer, is typified by the cases above cited,—such as the Challis Case, where the engine driver was struck by the stone thrown by a malicious boy, and the award was upheld upon the ground that engine drivers are exposed to an extra hazard inherent in the character of the work, and the Andrew Case, where the award in the case of the bricklayer killed by lightning upon a high scaffold was sustained upon like ground. The cases where liability is imposed upon the employer for extra hazard to his employees occasioned by his own act are typified by the Rowland (or Stable Cat) Case, and by the McNicols Case, where the award was sustained because the deceased employee had been beaten to death by a fellow workman in an intoxicated frenzy of passion: it being known to the employer that the offending workmen did so become intoxicated and did fall into violent fits of rage and would be liable to assault his fellow workmen when in such condition, but that nevertheless he was retained in the service of his employer.

It is in this case that the definition of an injury arising out of the employment is given and found acceptable by this court. The definition, it is proper to say, is but a compilation of the utterances of English judges, and it will be of advantage in determining the meaning of the language to quote some of these utterances. Thus says Cozens-Hardy, M. R., in Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union [1912] W. C. Rep. 222: "We have heard an argument from counsel for the respondent, that it did arise out of the employment because it took place on premises where Butler was engaged in working. If he was right in this argument, the words in the act providing that the accident must arise 'out of' the employment might be omitted, and the words providing that the accident should arise 'in the course of' the employment alone be left. The provision L.R.A.1917B.

that the accident must be an accident arising out of the employment has the meaning that the accident must arise out of some risk reasonably incidental to the employment. . . . There was nothing peculiar to his employment which rendered the risk of this accident happening greater than it would have been otherwise."

And says Buckley, L. J., in Fitzgerald v. Clarke [1908] 2 K. B. 796: "The latter words relate to the circumstances under which an accident of that character or quality takes place. The character or quality of the accident as conveyed by the words 'out of' involves, I think, the idea that the accident is in some sense due to the employment. It must be an accident resulting from a risk reasonably incidental to the employment."

And says Kennedy, L. J., in the same case: "The words [arising out of] appear to point to accidents 'arising from such causes as the negligence of fellow workmen in the course of the employment, or some natural cause incidental to the character of a business.'" "We conclude, therefore, that an accident arises 'out of' the employment when it is something the risk of which might have been contemplated by a reasonable person when entering the employment as incidental to it. That this is so appears from an examination of Armitage v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 778, 66 J. P. 613, 86 L. T. N. S. 883, 18 Times L. R. 648; Collins v. Collins [1907] 2 Ir. R. 104; Murphy v. Berwick [1909] 43 Ir. L. T. 126; and Blake v. Head [1912] 106 L. T. N. S. 822, 28 Times L. R. 321, 5 B. W. C. C. 303, in each of which recovery was denied because the act of the third party was not a risk reasonably to be contemplated by the employee in undertaking the employment." Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. L. 72, 86 Atl. 458, 3 N. C. C. A. 585.

Says Hardy, M. R., in Craake v. Wigan, [1909] 2 K. B. 635: "I think it would be dangerous to depart from that which, so far as I am aware, has been the invariable rule of the court of appeal since these acts came into operation, namely, to hold that it is not enough for the applicant to say, 'The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment, or if I had not been in that particular place.' He must go further and must say, 'The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger.' Unless something of that kind is established, the applicant must fail, because the accident is not one arising out of and in the course of the employment. In my view we should not be administering law and justice if we did not hold that the learned judge was quite right. The appeal must be dismissed."

And says Lord Salvesen, in Kinghorn v. Guthrie [1913] 50 Scot. L. R. 863, after setting forth with approval the language just quoted from Craske v. Wigan: "It is, of course, true that he would not have met with the accident unless he had been in that particular place, and that he would not have been in that particular place unless he had been engaged in that particular employer's work; but, as the master of the rolls said, that is not enough; you must point to something in the nature of the employment that makes you peculiarly liable to a risk of that kind."

That it may not be thought they have been intentionally ignored, it is pertinent to refer specifically to the cases cited in the prevailing opinion as supporting this award. The first of these is Martin v. John Lovibond & Sons. That case has already been considered. The drayman left his truck and crossed the street, drank one glass of ale, and, returning, was injured. The decision points out that the drayman, with his long hours of street service, was entitled, as a part of his employment, to adequate food, and that this included reasonable drink; that therefore he was engaged in his employment at the time the accident occurred, and, though he received his injuries upon the street, the nature of his employment exposed him to a peculiar hazard which brought the case within the compensatory terms of the act. Hoenig v. Industrial Commission also has been mentioned, and is the case where an employee working on a dam in the Fox river was killed by lightning, but the holding was that there was no special hazard in his employment which would entitle him to compensation. People's Coal & Ice Co. has also been mentioned. That also is the case of a special hazard by lightning growing out of the nature of the employment. The last case is Adamson v. George Anderson & Co. [1913] S. C. 1038, 50 Scot. L. R. 855, 6 B. W. C. C. 874. There a division of the Scottish court held that a workman who, during a violent gale, was engaged in erecting a stone-planing machine in an open yard, and who, while bending over, was struck and injured by a slate blown off the roof of an adjoining building, was entitled to compensation, because the character of his employment exposed him to this extra hazard. The case was declared by the court to one of the border line and doubtful cases. But immediately following that case, another division of the same court decided Kinghorn v. Guthrie, supra. There a carter, while leading his horse and wagon out of his employer's yard L.R.A.1917B.

in the course of his employment, was struck by a piece of corrugated iron blown by a high wind from the roof of an adjoining building, and it was held that the accident did not arise out of his employment. A not very successful attempt was made by the learned judges to distinguish this case from the preceding, the basis of the distinction seeming to be that in the Anderson Case the employee was bending over, looking at his work, and so was unable to detect his danger from the flying slate. It must be apparent, I think, that no one of these cases affords any support for upholding the award for an accident arising under the circumstances of the present case.

Attention may now be directed to a consideration of the definition in the McNicol's Case, and to the statement in the prevailing opinion, that "it seems clear that this case is one in which the accident and injury to Douglas can fairly be held to have 'arisen out of the employment' within the meaning of that term as it is defined in McNicol's Case."

But, before doing so, it should be pointed out that our own law is more specific than is the English law or the law of Massachusetts. With an apparent deliberate intent to limit the right of recovery to occupational or industrial accidents, it declares in terms the conditions which must exist before a recovery may be awarded, and one of those conditions is that the injury must have been "proximately caused by the employment." W. C. I. & S. Act, § 12, subdiv. 3, as amended by Stat. 1915, p. 1081, § 2.

Can it be said that this injury was proximately caused by the employment? If so, it is only in that very limited and discredited sense spoken of by Ruegg and again quoted: "It may be granted that but for the fact of his being engaged in the employment at the time the accident would not have happened to him. In this sense it may be said to have happened to him in the course of his employment, but in what fair sense could it be held to have arisen out of the employment? The employment may have been a cause sine qua non, but we do not think it could be regarded even as an effective cause of the accident."

And this, as we have seen from the quotations above, is the precise view taken by all the English and American courts; also, it is the precise view taken by the Massachusetts court. Says that court, compensation is to be allowed "if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work." But this accident was not an incident of the work, natural or unnatural. Compensation is allowed if the injury can be seen "to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment." There was nothing in the nature of this employment that exposed the injured person to this injury. Would any one say that, growing out of the nature of the employment of dishwashers, they are liable to be injured by the overloading of floors above the restaurants where they work? "It excludes," says the Massachusetts court, "an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause." This is nearly the language of our own statute just quoted and discussed. "The causative danger must be peculiar to the work," as the lightning stroke, or the stone throwing at locomotive engineers. Was this danger in the slightest sense peculiar to the work? "It must be incidental to the character of the business." Will it be said that it is incident to the character of the business of a dishwasher that he shall be injured by an outside agency in crushing down a ceiling over his head? "It need not have been foreseen or expected," which is perfectly true of most accidents, the precise form which they may take being beyond the reach of exact foreknowledge. But the accident "must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." This was a risk not in the slightest connected with the employment. It was an accident that happened to the man because his employment happened to place him where an independent tortious act of a third person inflicted injury upon him.

But it is said that the place where the injured man worked was unsafe, and that because it was unsafe the employer is liable. This pays not the slightest regard to all the other elements,—that the employer has failed in some duty, that the special condition was, or should have been, known to him. But the prevailing opinion reasons that because a place of employment has become unsafe, regardless of the acts and conduct of the employer, regardless of the means or measures by which it has been made unsafe, the employer is liable. Here, to my mind, is the grave mistake in reasoning leading to a most unwarranted extension of the law. The act of piling bottles of grape juice upon the floor above was negligent and tortious. It was the act of an independent third person, performed without the knowledge of the employer. Admittedly the employer was in no way responsible for this act. If, then, the employer is to be held responsible for all such kinds of accident upon the theory that the premises have become unsafe, and all this without regard to his chargeable knowledge of the fact, it inevitably results in declaring the employer to be an insurer of his employees whenever accident has befallen them while engaged in their duties. There can be no distinction between a tortious act committed by negligence and one committed by design. The injury that results will be the same; the right of compensation to the injured person is the same, saving, of course, in the exceptional case where punitive damages may be added. What would be said, then, if the accident had occurred by the intent of the man who piled the bottles of grape juice to accomplish the result which his negligence brought about? The place of labor would have become equally unsafe. Is it possible that our law contemplates a recovery for such a wrongful act not within the legitimate hazard of a business? Assuming that a destructive bomb had either carelessly or intentionally been left in the room above, and by its explosion the same injury had resulted,—the premises were made equally unsafe,—is the employer liable? The length of time when the premises became unsafe, or the knowledge of the employer that they have become unsafe, is utterly eliminated. The premises become equally unsafe, whether to the bomb is attached a one-minute fuse, or clockwork which will explode it in forty-eight hours. And for any and all of these acts it is held that the employer is liable in compensation. Yet every decision is to the contrary and limits the employer's liability to accidents legitimately connected with the hazards of the business. Let us take the case of the boy descending the flight of steps and made to fall by the tickling of a fellow employee. Assume that, instead of so doing, the fellow employee, in horseplay, had greased the steps and so occasioned the fall. Here would be another instance of the premises being unsafe, and here, under the authority of the prevailing opinion, the employer would be liable. Yet the decisions, as we have taken pains to point out, hold the employer to be exempt from liability for the wilfully tortious act either of fellow employees or of outsiders, and for all the negligent acts of fellow employees, unless the negligent act has a bearing upon the performance of the duties of the injured employee. The boy who was tickled was in the performance of his duty. The other boy, who negligently tickled him, was not.

If the boy had greased the steps the employer would have been liable, but because he tickled his companion the employer is exempt. Can this be the law? And if the unsafeness of the place of labor is the sole controlling consideration, what becomes of the Kelly Case, 42 Ir. L. T. 23; the Klawnski Case, 185 Mich. 643, L.R.A.1916A, 342,

152 N. W. 213; and the Hoenig Case, 159 Wis. 646, L.R.A.1916A, 339, 150 N. W. 996, 8 N. C. C. A. 192,—where, precisely as in the Andrew Case [1904] 2 K. B. 32, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 611, 68 J. P. 409, 52 Week. Rep. 451, 90 L. T. N. S. 611, 20 Times L. R. 429, 6 W. C. C. 11, the men were killed by lightning stroke? In all these cases indubitably the places of labor became as unsafe when the men were struck and awards denied as was the place where Andrew was struck and an award given. No one of these cases adopts for an instant the reasoning that an employer without fault can be held liable for an untoward and unexpected injury occasioned by act of God or a third person, nor accepts the theory that an employer may so be held liable because at the instant of the accident the place of labor had become unsafe. So far as all the adjudications go, it is uncontradicted that acts by outside agencies, willfully tortious or negligently done, are not acts arising out of the employment, even though they make the place of labor unsafe, unless peculiar and exceptional circumstances distinguish them; a familiar proposition, typified, as has been said, by such cases as the Challis Case and the Bryant Case.

In my judgment the award should be annulled.

We concur: Lorigan, J.; Melvin, J.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

HIGH L. BOGGS, Appt.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

Intoxicating liquor — manufacturing on shares — sale.

The performance of a contract by which a distiller is to make brandy from a quantity of apples furnished by the other party and deliver to him one half the product when completed, keeping one half for his services, is not a sale within the Local Option Law.

For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, III. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(November 16, 1916.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Johnson County convicting him of selling intoxicating liquor in violation of the Local Option Law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. John W. Wheeler for appellant.

Messrs. M. M. Logan, Attorney General, and D. O. Myatt, Assistant Attorney General, for the Commonwealth:

The facts as proven upon the trial of the case show that a sale was made within the meaning of the statute.

Com. v. Davis, 12 Bush, 240; Friedman v. Com. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1276, 83 S. W. 1040; 2 Woollen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, § 686; Com. v. Clark, 14 Gray, 367; Barnes v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 88 S. W. 804; Stanley v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 270, 64 S. W. 1051.

Note. — For manufacturing intoxicating liquors as a sale, see annotation following this case, post, 606.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

High L. Boggs was convicted of the offense of selling intoxicating liquor in violation of the Local Option Law, and his punishment fixed at a fine of $60. He appeals.

The only question presented is whether or not the facts show a sale within the meaning of the statute. It appears from the evidence that the prosecuting witness, Ernest Jayne, entered into an arrangement with the appellant, Boggs, who is a licensed distiller, by which Jayne was to deliver to Boggs a quantity of apples out of which Boggs was to make brandy. Boggs was to keep one half of the brandy for his services in distilling the apples and deliver to Jayne the other half of the brandy. Each party was to pay the internal revenue license on his half of the brandy. It further appears that in carrying out this arrangement the apples which Jayne delivered to Boggs were put in separate tubs and were separately distilled, and at no time were they mixed with apples belonging to Boggs or to other persons. On the contrary, the brandy that was actually divided between the parties was the product of the apples furnished by Jayne. In carrying out this agreement Jayne received between 19 and 20 gallons of brandy, and paid to Boggs, who was responsible therefor, his part of the internal revenue license. Jayne was neither a wholesale dealer nor a licensed retail dealer.

In addition to other instructions, the court instructed the jury as follows: "An arrangement or agreement between the prosecuting witness, Jayne, and the defendant, Boggs, by which Jayne delivered to defendant an amount or quantity of apples which were distilled into brandy, and one half of said brandy being delivered to Jayne by the defendant in consideration of said apples, constitutes a sale of liquor."

It is well settled that the transfer of H-quor to another, in consideration of any article of value, or of services to be performed by the transferee, constitutes a sale within the meaning of the statute. Therefore, if this were a case where Jayne merely exchanged his apples for brandy belonging to Boggs, there can be no doubt that the transaction would have been a sale, and that Boggs would have violated the Local Option Law. Com. v. Davis, 12 Bush, 240; Friedman v. Com. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1276, 83 S. W. 1040; Com. v. Clark, 14 Gray, 367; Barnes v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 88 S. W. 805; Stanley v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 270, 64 S. W. 1051.

Such a case, however, is not presented by the record. Here the prosecuting witness furnished a quantity of apples to be manufactured into brandy. Boggs was to have half of the brandy for his services. The brandy which the prosecuting witness received was the product of his own apples. The case is not unlike that of a farmer furnishing a particular quantity of wheat to a miller to be manufactured into flour, the miller to retain a certain portion of the flour for his services. Clearly the miller in returning to the farmer his portion of the flour manufactured from the particular wheat furnished by the farmer cannot be said to have sold the flour to the farmer. In the case under consideration the apples belonged to Jayne. His half of the brandy also belonged to him. In this portion of the brandy Boggs had no interest whatever. In delivering to Jayne his half of the brandy, Boggs merely returned to Jayne the latter's property. In a case involving facts identical with those above set out, the supreme court of Alabama held that the distiller was not guilty of selling, giving, or otherwise disposing of the brandy to the party who furnished the apples. Maxwell v. State, 120 Ala. 375, 25 So. 235. With this conclusion we agree.

It follows that the trial court not only erred in giving the instruction above referred to, but in refusing the peremptory asked for by the defendant. This conclusion is based on the facts before us. If upon another trial, however, there be evidence tending to show that Boggs merely exchanged his own brandy for Jayne's apples, the case should go to the jury.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Annotation—Intoxicating liquors: manufacturing under contract as a sale.

Although there is some authority to the contrary, the cases seems to establish the rule that a contract for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors from materials furnished does not constitute a sale, which is in accord with the holding of Boggs v. Com. ante, 605, that the performance of a contract to make brandy from apples furnished by another, and to deliver to him one half thereof, the distiller to keep the other half for his services, is not a sale within the Local Option Law.

In Maxwell v. State (1890) 120 Ala. 375, 25 So. 235, it was held that one who distilled apples into brandy on shares, retaining one half of the brandy for manufacturing it, was not guilty of selling, giving, or otherwise disposing of the brandy. Whether the apples were divided before distillation and the portion belonging to their owner distilled separately, or whether all the apples were distilled and a division of the brandy made, was held immaterial, the result having been attained of converting the apples into brandy; one half thereof was the property of the owner of the apples, and this half the distiller had no interest in, but was simply bound to return to the former as his property.

In Com. v. Clark (1860) 14 Gray (Mass.) 367, where two persons carried grain to defendant's distillery to have it distilled on shares, there was no evidence that either of them received liquor distilled from their grain. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury "that, if they were satisfied, upon this evidence, that it was the bona fide intention of the parties that the grain should be distilled upon shares, the fact that either of them, when the grain was delivered, received from liquor then manufactured his proportional share of the product of his grain, that is, the same amount and kind that he would have received if he had waited for his grain to be distilled, would not constitute the transaction a sale by the defendant." The court declined so to rule, and instructed the jury "that delivering grain by these persons to the defendant under an agreement that he should distil that grain, and return a specific portion of the liquor distilled from it, and retain the rest as a compensation for his services in distilling, and his returning such proportion of the very liquor distilled from that grain, would not constitute a sale, within the meaning of the statute; but if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that these persons or either of them delivered grain to the defendant, and received back from him, either at the time or subsequently, a quantity of intoxicating liquor, not distilled from that grain, in consideration for the grain so delivered, and intended as payment for the grain, such a transaction would constitute in law a sale, whatever agreement the parties may have made as to distilling the liquor on shares. The appellate court held that the jury were rightly instructed, and said: "The distinction between a sale and exchange of property is rather one of shadow than of substance. In both cases the title to property is absolutely transferred, and the same rules of law are applicable to the transaction, whether the consideration of the contract is money or by way of barter. It can make no essential difference in the rights and obligations of parties, that goods and merchandise are transferred and paid for by other goods and merchandise instead of by money, which is but the representative of value or property. If there can be any doubt on the question whether an exchange can be deemed a sale at common law, it is quite clear that no such doubt can exist under the provisions of law upon which the indictment in the present case is founded. By Stat. 1855, chap. 215, § 15, it is enacted that if any person 'shall, directly or indirectly, on any pretense or by any device, sell, or in consideration of the purchase of any other property give, to any person any spirituous or intoxicating liquor,' he shall be subject to the penalties in that section provided. The intention of the legislature by this provision was manifestly to cover every case of the transfer of intoxicating liquors for value, in whatever form the consideration for such transfer might be given or paid."

In Barnes v. State (1905) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 88 S. W. 805, where a conviction of selling liquor was reversed because of the refusal of the trial judge to give an instruction, required by the evidence, that the transaction constituted a gift, the court said: "We would further make the following observations as to this case: If the facts show that it was simply an exchange or barter of so much of prosecutor's peaches for brandy, it would constitute a sale. Com. v. Clark (Mass.) supra. There the rule appears to be laid down that one can have his grain or peaches manufactured into liquor, paying therefor toll out of his grain or peaches to the person manufacturing the same; but he must get his whisky or brandy out of the identical product furnished the distillery, and not out of something else. In case he does not get it out of the identical product furnished, it would be an exchange on his part, and, as is held by this court, an exchange is a sale; that is, if one takes peaches to a distillery and there exchanges the same for so much brandy, the party exchanging with him and furnishing the liquor would be guilty of a sale of the same; or if the distillery should receive peaches for the purpose of being distilled into brandy, and furnish the party bringing such peaches brandy in advance, it would be an exchange, and consequently a sale. On another trial, if the evidence suggests these matters they should be presented to the jury."

In Stanley v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 270, 64 S. W. 1051, where the owner of a distillery made an agreement with the prosecuting witness to exchange a pint of brandy for every bushel of peaches furnished by the witness, and the latter delivered peaches and subsequently received brandy in payment therefor, it was held that these facts showed an evasion of the Local Option Law prohibiting a sale in the district where the trade took place.

In Barnes v. State (1905) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 88 S. W. 804, an employee of a distiller who delivered, to one who brought peaches to the still, brandy made therefrom, in exchange for the peaches and the price of the revenue license, was convicted of violating the local option law. The court, citing the preceding case, said that the charge of the trial judge that the exchange of peaches for liquor constituted a sale, was correct. It further stated that certainly the payment, by the furnisher of the peaches, of the revenue license to the defendant would itself constitute a sale of the brandy, since the brandy was delivered as part consideration for the revenue license paid and peaches furnished. The judge who wrote the opinion in the preceding case, however, dissented, stating, "The Stanley Case [the preceding case] was decided on a question of exchange, where fruit was traded for brandy. Here the party received only his half of the brandy out of his own peaches, paying the owner of the still the other half for his services and labor in making the brandy. Hill owned the still, and the other party owned the peaches. It was more nearly related to partnership on the results, and not a sale."

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN
v.
FRANK B. LAY, JR.

(— Mich. —, 159 N. W. 299.)

Grand jury — competency of member — one investigating charge.

1. A United States commissioner who considers testimony taken in a bankruptcy proceeding against a corporation, and consults the district attorney with a view to issuing a warrant against one of the officers of the corporation for embezzlement, is not a prosecutor in an indictment in a state court against him for that offense within the meaning of a state statute making prosecutors incompetent to serve on the grand jury.

For other cases, see Grand Jury, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — duplicity — distinct facts.

2. A plea to an indictment for embezzlement, alleging that a United States commissioner sat on the grand jury and read to it minutes taken by him in a proceeding against the corporation whose money is alleged to have been embezzled, is bad for duplicity.

EXCEPTION before sentence, by respondent, to rulings of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County, in an indictment for embezzlement which resulted in his conviction. Reversed.

Statement by Brooke, J.:

Respondent in this case was indicted by a grand jury, and in said indictment was charged, together with one Victor L. Palmer and George T. Lay, with having embezzled from the Michigan Buggy Company, a corporation, of which respondent was vice president and a director, the sum of $42,446.52. To the information respondent interposed several pleas in abatement, the substance of which was as follows:

(1) That Joseph W. Stockwell, one of the grand jurors of the jury which found the indictment, was disqualified from acting, for the reason that said Stockwell was the United States commissioner for the western district of Michigan before and at the time he was drawn on said grand jury, acting as such in the western district of Michigan during all of the time he sat on said grand jury, and that before said grand jury was impeached, said Stockwell had before him as such commissioner the minutes of the testimony upon which respondent was indicted, given by respondent in the bankruptcy proceeding, with a view of issuing a warrant against this respondent under the statutes of the United States of America; and from his investigations, which included a consultation with the United States district attorney, said Stockwell became a part of the prosecuting force of the government of the United States of America, to prosecute this respondent upon the same state of facts upon which he was afterwards indicted by said grand jury; and that said Stockwell had power in his discretion to have started a criminal proceeding upon said state of facts against respondent; and that said Stockwell was one of the prosecutors against him on said state of facts before he was drawn on said grand jury, and was disqualified from acting as a grand juror for that reason.

It is further alleged that said Stockwell acted as a stenographer in the taking of testimony before the referee in bankruptcy in the matter of the Michigan Buggy Company, a bankrupt, that in said proceeding said Stockwell took the testimony of the respondent, and that the minutes of said testimony were used in said contemplated proceeding before said United States commissioner.

It is further alleged that the testimony so taken by Stockwell in the bankruptcy proceeding was by him read before the grand jury as evidence against respondent.

(2) That the books and writings of the Michigan Buggy Company and the testimony of the bookkeepers and clerks having the same in charge were used to secure the indictment of the respondent, and that such use was illegal under the Federal Bankruptcy Act (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9585).

(3, 4, 5) These pleas set up that various members of the grand jury were disqualified to act as said jurors, for the reason that they were stockholders in various banks, which banks were creditors of the bankrupt Michigan Buggy Company.

(6) It is charged that the respondent was summoned by the grand jury to give testimony before it, and that he appeared in obedience to said summons and gave such testimony; that, being without the advice of counsel, he did not know what questions he was privileged to refuse to answer, and he avers that, without his testimony so obtained, no indictment would have been found against him.

(7) It is charged that the name of Stockwell was not among those in the grand jury box, although an attempt had been made by those in charge of the grand jury to have his name placed upon the list by the supervisors. It is further charged that one Pomeroy, a juror, having been excused, Stockwell, who at the time was seated at his desk in the courtroom, acting as official stenographer of the ninth judicial circuit, was called as a spokesman, and immediately ceased to perform his duties as such stenographer, and proceeded to act as a member of the said grand jury, participating in all of its deliberations and voting for the indictment of the respondent.

The people filed a demurrer to said several pleas of abatement, contending that the same were insufficient in law to bar the people from prosecuting the said indictment. Respondent thereupon demanded a bill of particulars of the charges upon which the indictment in the cause was based. Such bill was presented by the people, and in it, it was charged that upon fifteen separate dates between June 2, 1913, and July 1, 1913, the defendant had embezzled certain sums of money, ranging from $100 to $3,900, and amounting in the aggregate to upwards of $40,000.

A brief history of the facts leading up to the indictment of the respondent, together with his brother, George T. Lay, and Victor L. Palmer, is as follows: The Michigan Buggy Company was incorporated in 1883, and reincorporated in 1893. In 1909 it had a capital stock of $300,000, all common stock, and that year $200,000 of preferred stock was issued, and the company, which theretofore seems to have attained a fair degree of prosperity as a manufacturer of buggies, embarked upon the manufacture of automobiles. This business was continued by the company until its bankruptcy in the summer of 1913. Up to 1912, M. H. Lane, F. B. Lay, Sr., and Victor L. Palmer were the owners of all the common stock of the concern. They constituted the board of directors, and were for many years the officers of the corporation, M. H. Lane being president, Frank B. Lay, Sr., treasurer, and Victor L. Palmer, secretary. Some time in the year 1912 (probably April 20th), one hundred shares of the common stock of the company were given to each of the sons of F. B. Lay, Sr., viz., George T. Lay and respondent, Frank B. Lay, Jr. The board of directors was increased from three to five, and George T. and Frank B. Lay, Jr., were made vice presidents. The respondent commenced to work for the company when he was eighteen years of age, in 1905, at a salary of $25 per month. This salary was increased from time to time, until, during the last year of the existence of the corporation, he drew, according to the books of the company, as assistant sales manager, the sum of $300 per month. This salary was paid by two separate checks of the company each month of $150 each. For some reason they were charged to two separate accounts upon the books. Prior to the year 1912, respondent's salary had never exceeded $1,800 a year. On April 20, 1912, a meeting of the board of directors was held, at which all of the directors were present. At this meeting Mr. Lane was deposed as president, and Frank B. Lay, Sr., was elected in his place. Mr. Lane was made chairman of the board and Mr. Palmer was elected secretary and treasurer. On February 8, 1912, at a meeting of the board of directors, the salaries of the officers of the company for the year 1912 were fixed as follows:

"Mr. Lane ..... $6,000 00
Mr. Lay ..... 6,000 00
Mr. Palmer ..... 6,000 00"

—with further compensation of $6,000 to Mr. Palmer, to be continued at the discretion of the board. In June, 1912, respondent and his brother having in the meantime been elected directors of the company, a meeting of four of the directors of the board, Mr. Lay, Sr., Mr. Palmer, George T. Lay, and the respondent, was held at the Burdick House in Kalamazoo. The fifth director, Mr. Lane, had no notice of this meeting. It was there talked over and agreed between the four directors attending that Mr. Lay, Sr., should draw a larger amount out of the business than he was then drawing according to the resolution of February 8, 1912, that Mr. Palmer's salary should be $25,000 per year, and that the salary of George T. Lay and respondent should be $12,000 per year each. The record does not disclose that any formal action was taken by the four members of the board at this meeting, or that any record thereof was made in the corporate books. Following this meeting, and commencing on July 1, 1912, respondent continued to receive, as before, his salary of $300 per month in two checks ($150 each), which were usually drawn and signed by himself, one of which being charged to "office and selling expense," the other to "personal account." In addition to this sum of $300, respondent received in cash from Palmer each month the sum of $700, which brought his salary up to $12,000 per annum, the amount agreed upon at the Burdick House meeting. Commencing January 1, 1913, respondent received cash payments from Mr. Palmer each month in an amount sufficient to make his salary, from January 1 to July 1, 1913, $25,000 per annum. No warrant for the payment of these sums by Palmer to respondent seems to have existed prior to March 29, 1913, upon which date the respondent, his brother, George T. Lay, and Palmer held a so-called meeting of the board of directors. Neither Mr. Lay, Sr., nor Mr. Lane was present. At this meeting the following business was transacted:

"Mr. George T. Lay moved that the following salaries paid to the officials of the company for the year ending January 31st, L.R.A.1917B.

1913, be hereby ratified and approved as follows:

M. H. Lane ..... $ 6,000 00
F. B. Lay, Sr., for salary paid and dividends paid upon both common and preferred stock, an amount less than ..... 35,000 00
George T. Lay, an amount not exceeding ..... 25,000 00
F. B. Lay, Jr., an amount not exceeding ..... 25,000 00
V. L. Palmer, an amount not exceeding ..... 25,000 00

"Mr. Palmer supported the motion, and it was put to vote and carried.

"Geo. T. Lay moved that the following officials' salary list be approved for the year ending January 31, 1914, unless otherwise ordered by this board:

M. H. Lane .....$ 6,000 00
F. B. Lay, Jr. .... 25,000 00
V. L. Palmer ..... 25,000 00
George T. Lay ..... 25,000 00

"Mr. Palmer supported the motion, which, being put to vote, was carried. Mr. George T. Lay moved that the salary of president, Mr. F. B. Lay, Sr., for the year ending January 31, 1914, be fixed at an amount of $35,000, provided, however, that the dividends paid Mr. Lay, Sr., upon both his common and preferred stock be construed as to apply against this authorization of salary, so that the combination of salary and common and preferred dividends do not exceed the amount stated, $35,000. Mr. Palmer supported the motion, and it, being put to vote, was carried. Mr. George T. Lay moved that whereas, the salary paid the chief engineer, Mr. W. H. Cameron, for the past year, was $10,000, and that while this salary was originally agreed upon to continue for a three-year period, for business reasons and commercial circumstances, he moved that for the second year the salary be fixed at $16,000. Mr. Palmer supported the motion, which was put to vote and carried. There being no further business, the meeting closed in due form."

In order to possess himself of the necessary cash with which to satisfy the "salaries" thus provided for, Mr. Palmer caused checks to be drawn, payable to cash. These checks were, by Mr. Palmer, cashed, and the money distributed to the various officers, including respondent. For each payment of cash received by respondent from Mr. Palmer respondent gave a receipt, a sample of which is as follows:

$1,783.33. February 1, 1913.
Received of the Michigan Buggy Company
$1,783.33, balance January salary.
F. B. Lay, Jr.

Most, if not all, of the checks drawn payable to cash and cashed by Palmer were charged upon the books of the company to "J. Roach & Company," and appeared on said books as an asset of the corporation. It is fairly inferable from the record that the "J. Roach & Company" account was a fictitious account, invented for the purpose of concealing the withdrawal of the funds represented by it.

The jury returned a general verdict of "guilty," and the case is now before us upon exceptions before sentence.

Messrs. Edwin M. Irish, Charles H. Farrell, and Allan H. Frazer, for respondent:

The facts are not sufficient to warrant the court in submitting to a jury the question of whether an embezzlement has been committed, and to sustain a verdict founded on such facts only.

Supp. 1073.

Messrs. Charles W. Nichols, Frank F. Ford, and Grant Fellows, Attorney General, for the People.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first matter requiring consideration is the assignment of error based upon the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the several pleas in abatement. The statute involved (Comp. Laws 1897, § 11881) provides: "A person held to answer to any criminal charge, may object to the competency of any one summoned to serve as a grand juror, on the ground that he is the prosecutor or complainant upon any charge against such person; and if such objection be established, the person so summoned shall be set aside."

Section 11882 provides: "No challenge to the array of grand jurors, or to any person summoned as a grand juror, shall be allowed in any other case than that specified in the preceding section."

This court has frequently held that no objection can be made to a grand jury, or to any member thereof, except for reasons specified in the statute. People v. Reigel, 120 Mich. 79, 78 N. W. 1017; People v. Salsbury, 134 Mich. 537, 96 N. W. 936. The question, therefore, under the first part of the first plea in abatement, is whether Mr. Stockwell, at the time he was placed upon the grand jury, was a "prosecutor or complainant upon any charge against such person" within the meaning of the statute. It is strenuously urged on behalf of respondent that because Stockwell, before he was called to the grand jury, had the minutes of the testimony taken by him in the bankruptcy proceeding, and as a United States commissioner had made an investigation which included a consultation with the United States district attorney with a view to issuing a Federal warrant against the respondent upon the same state of facts relied upon in the case at bar, he should therefore be held to be a "prosecutor" within the meaning of the excluding statute. It should be observed that the plea does not allege that any warrant against respondent was issued by Stockwell, but only alleges that Stockwell considered the testimony taken in the bankruptcy proceeding "with a view of issuing a warrant." A "prosecutor" is said to be "one who instigates the prosecution upon which the accused is arrested." State v. Cohn, 9 Nev. 179, 191; Phillips v. Bevans, 23 N. J. L. 373; United States v. Sandford, 1 Cranch, C. C. 323, Fed. Cas. No. 16,221. As defined by Bouvier, a "prosecutor" is "one who prefers an accusation against a party whom he suspects to be guilty." A prosecutor cannot exist unless there is a prosecution, and a prosecution involves the idea of a formal complaint, information, or indictment filed against the criminal. People v. Garnett, 129 Cal. 364, 61 Pac. 1114; Day v. Otis, 8 Allen, 477. We think it clear that Stockwell was neither "prosecutor nor complainant" within the meaning of the statute.

The second part of the first plea avers, upon information and belief, that the minutes of the testimony taken before Stockwell in the bankruptcy proceeding were used and read before the grand jury as evidence against respondent by Stockwell. Assuming that this averment is intended by the pleader to strengthen the claim that Stockwell was a prosecutor within the meaning of the statute, it requires no further discussion; if, however, the pleader intended, by including this averment in the first plea, to charge that the indictment was founded upon incompetent testimony, the plea would fail for duplicity. Findley v. People, 1 Mich. 234, where it is held that a plea which states several distinct facts having no relation or dependence upon each other is bad for duplicity.

The mere fact that incompetent, improper, and irrelevant testimony was received and considered by the grand jury is L.R.A.1917B.

not fatal to the indictment, unless such testimony is the only testimony considered by them. People v. Lauder, 82 Mich. 109, 46 N. W. 956 and cases there cited and discussed.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth pleas in abatement are not discussed by counsel for respondent.

The sixth plea in abatement is argued by counsel for respondent, but the argument refers rather to the use of the testimony given by respondent in the bankruptcy proceeding before the grand jury than to the fact that respondent himself was required to give testimony before the grand jury, which is the gravamen of the plea. The same point was raised in the case of People v. Lauder, supra, and was there passed upon contrary to the contention of the respondent.

With reference to the seventh plea in abatement, it is sufficient to say that the matter urged as an objection to the validity of the action of the grand jury is outside the provisions of the statute, and cannot be considered on a motion to quash the indictment.

It is argued on behalf of respondent that the court erroneously refused to direct a verdict for defendant at the close of the people's case upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which the jury could properly predicate a verdict of "guilty." Of course, if there was any evidence of respondent's guilt, its weight and sufficiency were for the jury. People v. Eaton, 59 Mich. 559, 26 N. W. 702. The statute under which respondent was indicted (Comp. Laws 1897, § 11565) provides: "If any officer, agent, clerk, or servant of any incorporated company, or of any city, township, incorporated town, or village, school district, or other public or municipal corporation, or if any clerk, agent, or servant of any private persons, or of a copartnership, except apprentices and other persons under the age of sixteen years, shall embezzle or fraudulently dispose of or convert to his own use, or shall take or secrete with intent to embezzle and convert to his own use, without consent of his employer or master, any money or other property of another, which shall have come to his possession, or shall be under his charge by virtue of such office or employment, he shall be deemed by so doing, to have committed the crime of larceny."

After a careful examination of the record in this case we are unable to agree with the contention of counsel for respondent that it contains no evidence tending to prove that the moneys taken and received by the respondent from the Michigan Buggy Company under the guise of salary were so taken knowingly and wilfully, and with the deliberate intention of embezzling them. It would avail nothing to point out the evidential matter which in our opinion justifies this conclusion.

Reference is made to the preceding statement of facts. It should be said in this connection, however, that some of the facts stated may rest upon the admission of incompetent testimony, which will be herein-after discussed, but with the elimination of these there still remains sufficient, in our opinion, to carry the case to the jury.

Section 7, ¶ 9, chap. 3, of the Bankruptcy Act (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 548, Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 560, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 9591) provides that it is the duty of the bankrupt to "submit to an examination concerning the conducting of his business, the cause of his bankruptcy, his dealings with his creditors and other persons, the amount, kind, and whereabouts of his property, and, in addition, all matters which may affect the administration and settlement of his estate; but no testimony given by him shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding."

It will be remembered that in the bankruptcy proceeding involving the affairs of the Michigan Buggy Company the respondent was examined, and that during the period covered by his examination he was vice president and a director of the bankrupt corporation. Upon his trial in the case at bar, the people offered in evidence his testimony given in the bankruptcy proceeding. Strenuous objection was made on behalf of the respondent to its reception, but it was received, and much of it was read to the jury. To this action by the court, respondent duly excepted.

On behalf of the people it is argued that respondent is not the bankrupt, and therefore that the provision of the statute does not apply to his testimony. On the other hand, counsel for respondent insist that, as corporations can act only through their officers, who are natural persons, a reasonable interpretation of the statute would include officers of bankrupt corporations within the term "bankrupt." With this view of the statute we are inclined to agree. The purpose of the statute would seem to be to secure from the bankrupt all information with reference to the bankrupt estate which would facilitate its orderly and economic administration. If the testimony of officers of bankrupt corporations may afterwards be used against them in criminal proceedings growing out of facts involved in the bankruptcy, they will be found reluctant to testify, and probably relying upon their constitutional privileges in refusing to testify. L.R.A.1917B.

Under this view it follows that the admission of the testimony given by respondent in the bankruptcy case was erroneous, and we are unable to say that such error was without prejudice, although without the use of such testimony the jury might have reached the same result. Upon the trial Frank B. Lay, Sr., and Victor L. Palmer were both called as witnesses by the people. Both declined to testify as to facts within their knowledge concerning the charge against respondent claiming constitutional privilege. Respondent himself did not take the stand, but, as before pointed out, his testimony taken in the bankruptcy proceeding was read.

During the argument of the prosecuting attorney to the jury the following occurred.

He said:

I have not a word to say about this respondent or Mr. Palmer testifying here, but I do have a word to say about this. . . .

Mr. Irish: I except to that part of the argument.

The Court: I will say that the prosecuting attorney has no right to comment upon the failure of the accused to testify, and he should refrain from making any comment, or any suggestion of any sort, relative to the failure of the respondent to testify, and the jury will disregard the same absolutely. And, again, if this salary proposition that is here in question was operated only (openly), legally, and above board, why haven't the facts been put on here by those witnesses who refused to testify, who knew considerable about it?

Mr. Irish: We except to that, we are not responsible for that.

The Court: That is true, the respondent is not responsible for his father's failure to testify, or Mr. Palmer's, either.

Mr. Frazer: We ask the court to instruct the prosecuting attorney that he has no right to talk about that to the jury.

The Court: The refusal of Mr. Palmer or F. B. Lay, Sr., to testify, in and of itself, can raise no presumption against the respondent.

Mr. Frazer: Give me an exception.

And again: After we have brought all this before you, are you going out and say that this respondent is not guilty of improperly and illegally taking the funds of this company?

Mr. Irish: I would like to save the point as to the remarks of the prosecuting attorney giving his opinion.

Other remarks of the prosecuting attorney or his assistant were made in the course of the argument, referring to the fact that two of the witnesses, Lay, Sr., and

Palmer, had stood on their constitutional privilege. The statute (Comp. Laws 1897, § 10211) provides: " . . . That a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness, and his neglect to testify shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall the court permit any reference or comment to be made to or upon such neglect."

This statute and alleged breaches of it have been under consideration by this court in the following cases: People v. Evans, 72 Mich. 367, 40 N. W. 473; People v. Payne, 131 Mich. 474, 91 N. W. 739; People v. Hammond, 132 Mich. 422, 93 N. W. 1084; People v. Cahill, 147 Mich. 201, 110 N. W. 520; People v. Mitchell, 164 Mich. 583, 129 N. W. 698; People v. Peterson, 166 Mich. 10, 131 N. W. 153. In all these cases, remarks of the prosecuting attorney with reference to the failure of the accused to take the stand were held to constitute reversible error. In the case at bar the record discloses no remarks on the part of counsel for respondent which would tend to excuse or justify the criticism of the prosecuting attorney. The statute does not prohibit reference to the fact that witnesses other than the accused have failed to testify, though in our opinion such reference might well have been omitted. Many assignments of error are based upon the charge of the court. Certain isolated sentences, taken alone, may be subject to criticism, but, as a whole, the charge is full, fair, and, in our opinion, carefully preserved every substantial right of the respondent.

Because of the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Annotation—Who is within protection of provision of Bankruptcy Act as to use in criminal proceeding of testimony given by bankrupt.

The provision of the Bankruptcy Act which is under consideration herein is found in § 7, clause 9, and is quoted in PEOPLE v. LAY, ante, 608. The question, then, is as to who is a "bankrupt" within the meaning of that provision, that being the term used therein. In this connection it may of course be assumed that there is no question that an individual becoming a bankrupt and giving testimony with respect to matters connected with the subject dealt with in such clause is entitled to the immunity therein provided for. The question then arises as to who else, if anyone, is a "bankrupt" within the meaning of the provision. Upon this phase of the question it has been expressly held that a reasonable interpretation of the statute would include officers of a bankrupt corporation, such being the rule laid down in PEOPLE v. LAY, wherein it was ruled that testimony given by a director and vice president of a corporation in bankruptcy proceedings against the corporation was within the protection of clause 9 of § 7 of the Bankruptcy Act. And this decision was followed and approved in People v. Lay (1916) — Mich. —, 160 N. W. 467, which involved another director and vice president of the same bankrupt corporation, the court holding that it saw no reason for modifying the conclusion reached in the earlier decision. And the court in Re Alphin & L. Cotton Co. (1904) 131 Fed. 824, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 653, apparently implies that the officers of a bankrupt corporation were within the meaning of § 7, clause 9. The case of Cameron v. United States (1914) 231 U. S. 710, 58 L. ed. 448, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244, may also be of interest. In that case it was contended that testimony given by the president and treasurer of a bankrupt corporation on a hearing before a commissioner was inadmissible on a prosecution based upon alleged false swearing in the bankruptcy proceedings because within the immunity clause of § 7, subdiv. 9, of the Bankruptcy Act; but the court refuted same upon the ground that such provision had no application in prosecutions for perjury, no suggestion being made that the officer of the bankrupt who gave the testimony was not within the meaning of the provision. And see also People v. Swarts (1902) 8 Am. Bankr. Rep. (Ill.) 487, wherein it was questioned, but not decided, whether the provision of the Bankruptcy Act under consideration herein extends to officers of an insolvent bankrupt corporation.

And the immunity clause has been held applicable to the testimony of the individual members of a firm given by them when examined at the meeting of the creditors in bankruptcy proceedings against the firm. This view was taken in Clark v. State (1914) 68 Fla. 433, 67 So. 135, it being held that testimony given by a member of the firm in the bankruptcy proceedings was not admissible in a subsequent criminal prosecution against such member. So, in Re Nachman (1902) 114 Fed. 995, it seems to have been assumed that the individual members of a bankrupt firm were within the meaning of the provision under consideration herein.

But in United States v. Simon (1906) 146 Fed. 89, it was held that the application of clause 9 was restricted to testimony given by a bankrupt in his own bankruptcy case and did not prohibit the use of a bankrupt's testimony given in any other case.

And in Re Feldstein (1900) 103 Fed. 269, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 982, the court recognized the fact that the immunity clause of § 7, subdiv. 9, was not in terms broad enough to apply to a witness other than the bankrupt himself. And see Ensign v. Pennsylvania (1913) 227 U. S. 592, 57 L. ed. 658, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, affirming (1910) 228 Pa. 400, 77 Atl. 657, which affirmed (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 157, wherein it was held that the testimony of an expert accountant based upon an examination of the bankrupt's books while they were in custody of the trustee in bankruptcy could not be excluded upon the prosecution of the bankrupt in a state court upon the theory that the provision of the Bankruptcy Act, that no testimony given by a bankrupt upon his examination shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding, was applicable.

As to admissibility of schedules filed in Federal bankruptcy proceedings in the prosecution of the bankrupt for concealment of property, see note to Johnson v. United States, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1194. And generally, as to use in criminal proceedings of books which one has been required to produce in another proceeding as violation of his right against self-incrimination, see note to Johnson v. United States, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263. And as to right of corporation, corporate officer, or other person having custody of its books and papers, to refuse to produce them on the ground that they may tend to incriminate, see note to Burnett v. State, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1175. And as to right of officer of a corporation to refuse to turn over its books to a receiver upon the ground that they have a tendency to incriminate him, see note to Manning v. Mercantile Securities Co. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 725. As to incriminating evidence furnished by defendant acting under compulsion, see note to State v. Turner, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 772.

Sale — bailment to sell — effect.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

In January, 1913, the Segerstrom Piano Manufacturing Company entered into the following agreement with the Wisconsin Music Company of Superior, Wisconsin:

Consignment Contract.

The undersigned Wisconsin Music Company, Superior, Wisconsin, hereinafter referred to as second party, hereby enters into mutual agreement with Segerstrom Piano Manufacturing Company, hereinafter designated as first party, to sell pianos furnished by first party on consignment, upon the following terms and conditions:

All pianos shipped to second party and all money, notes, contracts, and leases and proceeds of sales, shall be and remain at all times the property of first party free from liens and encumbrances or claim of creditors of second party until such pianos are sold to private purchasers and the proceeds thereof delivered to first party.

Purchaser's notes, contracts, or leases shall be made upon blanks furnished by first party, and shall draw interest at not less than 6 per cent, and all such papers, when approved by first party, shall be indorsed by second party, and the payment of the same, including the instalments, guaranteed at maturity; and the second party does hereby waive protest and notice of protest on the same.

Second party agrees to sell all instruments consigned, within four months from date of shipment; or if any of said instruments remain unsold after four months, second party agrees to pay interest after that time on the same, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on the invoice price; but it is expressly understood that the charge of said interest and the payment thereof shall not be construed as indicating a sale of said instrument to second party.

The compensation for selling these instruments shall be such amount as second party shall obtain in excess over the price the said instrument is billed to him. On cash sales the commission shall be payable when the first party receives pay for the instrument. On time sales the first payment may be retained by the second party if the same does not exceed the commission on L.R.A.1917B.

the sale; the balance of said commission, if any, to be paid to second party as first party receives money from the purchaser after the invoice price has been paid.

All instruments taken back from customers on account of default of payments, or for other causes, and all new or secondhand instruments taken in exchange, or in part payment for instruments, consigned by first party, are to be regarded the same as goods consigned, and to be accounted for in the same manner. Second party agrees to send first party a statement the first day of each and every month of all instruments received and sold, and remaining on hand, unsold, and make prompt returns as sales are made.

Upon demand of first party or of its agent, second party will deliver as first party may direct, free of charge or expense of any kind to first party, any and all of the said goods remaining unsold at the time of said demand, including the original packing cases of same. All goods returned to first party to be passed to second party's credit at 90 per cent of original bill, the balance, 10 per cent, being deducted for the depreciation and shopwear of goods, except instruments which have been taken in exchange or trade from customers or for default in payment on notes or leases, such stock to be credited at a fair cash value, to be determined by first party. Second party agrees to pay all freight, taxes, and expenses, and to insure all stock against loss by fire, loss payable to Segerstrom Piano Manufacturing Company.

This agreement may be terminated at any time by either party, and any stock then on hand will be subject to the order of the first party.

Plaintiffs were appointed receivers of the manufacturing company, and, as such, shipped a carload of pianos to the music company. While the above agreement was made before the appointment of the receivers, it sufficiently appears that this shipment was made thereunder. When the car reached Superior, and before it had been unloaded, the music company gave a bill of sale of the pianos to one of their creditors, as security for his claim, under a verbal agreement that the pianos should remain in the car for ten days, and be returned to the music company if they paid the debt within the time. The bill of sale purported to transfer the property absolutely, was accompanied by an order directing the railway company to deliver it to the vendee. Contrary to his promise, the creditor, on the same day that he received his bill of sale, sold the pianos to defendant, and defendant took them from the car and placed them in its store at Duluth. As soon as knowledge of these transactions reached plaintiffs, they demanded the pianos from defendant, and, the demand being refused, brought this action to recover possession of them. The trial court found that defendant was a good-faith purchaser for value; and held that the above agreement was a contract of conditional sale, and was void as against defendant because not filed in the office of the city clerk, as required by the Wisconsin statute; and that defendant was entitled to judgment. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial; the motion was denied, and they appealed.

1. The question to which both parties have devoted the greater part of their brief and argument is whether the above agreement constituted an agency and created a bailment only, or whether it constituted a conditional sale of the pianos. Agreements are occasionally so drawn that it is difficult to determine whether they constitute a conditional sale or a bailment; but there are certain distinguishing tests which usually make the matter clear. A sale contemplates that, at some time, the title shall pass to the vendee, and that, at some time and in some manner, he shall pay the purchase price. A bailment contemplates that the title shall not pass to the bailee, but remain in the bailor, and that the property shall be returned to the bailor, or be disposed of as he shall direct.

When we examine the contract in controversy to determine its purpose and effect, we find that the music company never becomes the owner of the pianos, and is not even given an option to buy them; that it nowhere obligates itself to pay for them, but only to account for the proceeds received upon sales to others; that it must return to plaintiffs all pianos not sold to actual purchasers whenever directed so to do; and that it may terminate the arrangement whenever it chooses and return all pianos then on hand. We further find that plaintiffs remain owners of the pianos until sold to private purchasers, with the right to recall them at any time before sale; that they can compel the music company to account for and turn over the proceeds of all sales, but cannot compel the music company, itself, to take any of the pianos or pay for any of them; and that they may terminate the arrangement at any time and thereupon must take back all pianos then on hand. The contract imposed onerous burdens upon the music company, including the obligation to pay interest upon pianos not sold within four months, and 10 per cent as depreciation upon those returned, but plainly does not intend that the company shall ever own the pianos or pay the purchase price for them. It plainly does intend that they shall remain the property of the consignor until sold to an actual purchaser by the consignee, and shall be returned to the consignor unless so sold. The contract contains all the essentials of a factorage bailment, but does not contain the essentials of a sale. It constituted a bailment with power to sell, but did not constitute a conditional sale to the bailee, and is not within the statute requiring contracts of conditional sale to be recorded. Re Columbus Buggy Co. 74 C. 2. The trial court found that defendant was a good-faith purchaser for value. As the evidence was such that the court could have found either way upon that question, the finding must stand although the evidence to support it is weak. Defendant contends that, being a good-faith purchaser, it acquired a valid title as against plaintiffs, and in support of this contention cites Cochran v. Stewart, 21 Minn. 436, and other cases which hold that, if a vendee whose title is voidable for fraud sells the property to a good-faith purchaser, the purchaser acquires a valid title. Such cases show the desire of the law to protect good-faith purchasers, but are not in point, for there the original vendor in fact vested title in the vendee, while here he retained the title in himself. Being the owners of the property, plaintiffs have the right to reclaim it unless debarred therefrom by some principle of estoppel. They intrusted the property to an agent with power to sell. The agent, to secure his own debt, wrongfully purported to make an absolute sale of the property to one of his creditors. The creditor wrongfully sold the property to defendant, who purchased and paid for it in good faith.

It has always been the law that a bailor may pursue his property and reclaim it, even in the hands of a good-faith purchaser from or under the bailee, unless estopped by his own conduct from causing loss to such purchaser. Warder, B. & G. Co. v. Rublee, 42 Minn. 23, 43 N. W. 509; Hedderly v. Backus, 53 Minn. 27, 55 N. W. 116; Baker v. Taylor, 54 Minn. 71, 55 N. W. 823; also, cases cited in note found in 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) at page 760. If the owner consigns his property to a factor for sale, and the factor pledges it for his own debt, or sells it to a creditor to apply on such debt, the same rule applies. In Warner v. Martin, 11 How. 209, 13 L. ed. 667, merchandise intrusted to a factor for sale was sold to one Warner, a creditor of the factor, to apply on the factor's debt, and a portion of it was thereafter sold by Warner to Heald, Woodward, & Company who were good-faith purchasers. The court says: "A factor or agent who has power to sell the produce of his principal has no power to affect the property by tortiously pledging it as a security or satisfaction for a debt of his own, and it is of no consequence that the pledger is ignorant of the factor's not being the owner. . . . By the common law, the transfer of the plaintiff's tobacco to Warner cannot be maintained. He is responsible to them for the value of so much of it as was not transferred by him to Heald, Woodward, & Company. Heald, Woodward, & Company are responsible for so much of it as Warner transferred to them, because Warner, having no property in it, could not convey any to them."

The rule is stated in 19 Cyc. 174, as follows: "In the absence of statutes which furnish protection to persons dealing with factors, the principal can recover his property whenever he can trace it as distinct from that of the factor into whomsoever's hands it may have come. He is entitled to recover the specific goods themselves if they can be had, and if the goods themselves cannot be recovered, he may recover their proceeds if they can be traced. Thus, if a factor barter his principal's goods in a manner not authorized by the principal and not within the ordinary modes of transacting business, the principal may follow and reclaim the property, whether the person dealing with the factor knew him to be such or not. But if the principal has by any act of his own induced a third person to believe he has given the factor authority to dispose of the goods, the principal cannot reclaim them. The principal may recover goods or the proceeds of a consignment of a person to whom they were turned over in the payment of an antecedent debt due from the factor."

In Eilers Music House v. Fairbanks, 80 Wash. 379, 141 Pac. 885, plaintiff consigned a quantity of player pianos to a factor for sale. The factor sold one of them to apply on his own debt to a creditor having notice of the bailment. The creditor sold it to a good-faith purchaser. Plaintiff brought replevin against the purchaser. The Washington court quotes the above excerpt from Cyc. and then says: "This rule applies to a purchaser without notice from one who has acquired possession of property from a factor through barter or exchange, or in consideration of a pre-existing debt. Warner v. Martin, supra. This is true because one who purchases from a factor in consideration of a pre-existing debt, or in part consideration of a pre-existing debt and barter or exchange, acquires no title, and, having no title, can pass none. This rule, of course, is subject to the equitable principles of estoppel, where the facts are such as to bring the case within them; but there are no such facts present in the case at bar."

A large number of cases bearing upon the same question are cited in a note found in 28 Ann. Cas. at page 1290.

3. The remaining question is whether plaintiffs are estopped from reclaiming the pianos from defendant. When defendant purchased the pianos they were in a car standing upon a sidetrack in the railroad yard at Superior. Defendant's vendor exhibited a bill of sale from the Wisconsin Music Company, and an order from that company directing the railroad company to deliver them to such vendor. Defendant knew that the pianos were not being sold in the ordinary course of business, but considered that it was getting a bargain and that its vendor was responsible. Defendant did not know who had shipped the pianos; did not know from whom, or in what manner, or under what conditions, the Wisconsin Music Company had acquired them, and made no inquiry from anyone concerning any of these matters. Neither defendant nor its vendor ever had possession of the bill of lading, so far as the record discloses, and defendant never made any inquiry concerning it. Defendant knew merely that the pianos were in the car and that the music company had executed a bill of sale for them to defendant's vendor, accompanied by an order on the railroad company to deliver them, and frankly admits that it neither learned nor sought to learn anything more concerning them. We find nothing which can be held to estop plaintiffs from reclaiming their property. Freeman v. Kraemer, 63 Minn. 242, 65 N. W. 455; Kiewel v. Tanner, 105 Minn. 50, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 772, 117 N. W. 231.

Order reversed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

D. M. FERRY &amp; COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

SMITH HALL, Tax Collector.

(188 Ala. 178, 66 So. 104.)

Sale — placing of seed on commission — passing of title.

A consignment of seed in response to an order to be sold by the consignee at prices and upon terms to be fixed by him, the consignee to account on demand for all seed sold at invoice prices less commission, and the consignor to take back all seed unsold at invoice prices, constitutes a sale and the passing of title, although the order states that the seed is to be sold on commission and a label on the packages states that the seed is placed on commission, not sold outright.

For other cases, see Sale, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(June 30, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Houston County in defendant's favor in an action submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, for the recovery of taxes paid under protest by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

The exhibits mentioned in the opinion are as follow:

Exhibit A.

D. M. Ferry &amp; Co., Detroit, Mich.

Please forward in due season a number blank box of standard garden seed, flower seed, and field seed, to sell on commission for the year 191—, on the following terms, viz., 40 per cent commission on papers sold, and 25 per cent on packages sold from the invoice prices; the unsold seed with the boxes to be returned in good order when called for, and the amount due for all seed not so returned to be paid for at same time.

On the reverse side was certain printing and blank not necessary to be here set out.

Exhibit B.

Memorandum of shipment from D. M. Ferry & Company, Detroit, Michigan, to John Doe, Dothan, Alabama.

In compliance with your order we have this day forwarded you care of ———, box ——— of our standard garden seed, an itemized retail invoice of which you will find on inside of box cover. If at any time

Note.—As to construction of contract having some provisions peculiar to consignment and agency contracts, and others to sale contracts, see annotation following this case, post, 626.

you have not a sufficient supply of 5 cent papers, please order such as you may need, and we will promptly forward them by mail postpaid.

Then follow certain directions as to freight charges, etc., and the added caution: "Please have goods removed from depot promptly on arrival and avoid storage charges."

Exhibit C.

No allowance for exchange. Error or shortage must be reported at once. D. M. Ferry & Company give no warranty, express or implied, as to descriptions, surety, productiveness, or any other matter on any seed they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are to be returned at once. We agree to buy back all unsold seed with boxes at prices billed, less discount, when our traveler calls.

This invoice and memorandum of shipment, together with the order marked "Exhibit A," constitutes the original contract between D. M. Ferry & Company, and the original merchant. On the boxes shipped would be pasted the following paster, marked "Exhibit D." This case, including all papered seed and boxes invoiced on case cover are placed on commission, not sold outright.

D. M. Ferry &amp; Company.

The further facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Standish Backus and Well, Stakely, & Vardaman, for appellant:

D. M. Ferry and Company were not liable for the taxes assessed to them on said seed, because the title to the seed had vested in the retail merchants at the time of its delivery to the merchants.

The contracts under which the seed were shipped into Alabama are contracts of sale under which title passes on delivery, and are not contracts of agency or of bailment.

Mfg. Co. v. Lyons, 153 Ill. 427, 38 N. E. 661.

Messrs. Espy & Farmer for appellee.

Gardner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was transferred to this court from the court of appeals under the provision of Acts of 1911, p. 449.

The appellant brought suit against the appellee for the recovery of $203 paid by appellant to appellee, as tax collector for Houston county, under protest; suit having been brought by said tax collector for said sum due as taxes and garnishment issued in aid thereof.

The cause was submitted in the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, in which it was agreed that the facts in said cause were set out in said agreement, and that the "cause be submitted to the jury upon said statement of facts, and that the liability, if any, of the defendant, arises out of said facts." The agreement further stipulates: "It is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that the only question presented for the court for its decision in this case is whether or not the assessment for the collection of the taxes due on said seed should have been made against the said D. M. Ferry & Company, or against the merchants to whom said D. M. Ferry & Company had shipped the seed, and in whose possession said seed were at the time the assessments were made, under the facts hereinafter set forth; and if the assessments for the collection of said taxes should have been made against said D. M. Ferry & Company, then the defendant is entitled to judgment; but if said assessments for the collection of said taxes should not have been made against D. M. Ferry & Company, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

The sole question, therefore, for determination, is: In whom, for the purposes of taxation, vested the title or property to the seed in possession of the retail merchants? If the seeds were the property of the appellant, then it is conceded and agreed the defendant is entitled to judgment, and, on the other hand, it is likewise conceded and agreed that, if the seeds were the property of the retail merchants, then appellant is entitled to judgment.

The order of the retail merchant, the letter of acceptance accompanied by the invoice, and the placing of the paster marked in the record "D" on the box when shipped, together with the method or course of dealing with reference to said transactions between the wholesaler and the retailer, as disclosed by said agreed statement of facts, are the matters upon which, according to said agreement, we are to conclude the title to said seed.

The order has on it the word "consignment," and that which is signed by the retailer has the words "to sell on commission" showing the terms as 40 per cent commission on the papers sold, and 25 per cent on the packages sold, from the invoice prices; the unsold seed, with boxes, to be returned in good order when called for, and amount due for all seeds not so returned to be paid at the same time.

The invoice which accompanied the memorandum of shipment had thereon, among other things, the following: "Terms: To be settled for when traveler calls. Sold to Mr. John Doe, etc. We agree to buy back all unsold seeds with boxes at prices billed, less discounts, when our traveler calls."

The agreement shows that this memorandum of shipment and invoice, together with the order, constituted the original contract between appellant and the retail merchant, but that the boxes, when shipped, would have pasted on them the paper marked in record "Exhibit D," and which appears in report of the case. The reporter will set out Exhibits A, B, C, and D, as found on pages 12, 13, 14, and 15 of the transcript, in his report of the case.

The following extract from the agreed statement of facts explains the method or course of dealing as between the wholesale and retail merchants, as to such transactions:

"At the close of each season in which said seed was so sold, the traveling salesman representing D. M. Ferry & Company, would call upon the retail merchant and adjust the local dealer's account with D. M. Ferry & Company, taking back the unsold seeds in said box or boxes, allowing credit for the seed at invoice prices, and collecting cash for the balance of the seed at invoice prices, less the commission provided for in the original contract. The retailer, in selling the foregoing seed to his customers, would fix the price at which he would sell them, and would also have entire control of the seed while the seed was in his possession and control, and would also sell the seed and collect for the seed from his customers in his own name. D. M. Ferry & Company were in no way interested in the price which the retailer obtained for the said seed, but merely took back the unsold seed, allowing credit therefor at invoice prices, and collecting, for the seed not returned, the invoice prices less commissions. The said seed were in packages and papers. D. M. Ferry & Company printed a price upon said packages, but printed no price upon the papers; but, for the seed not returned by the retailer to D. M. Ferry & Company, the L.R.A.1917B.

retailer accounted to D. M. Ferry & Company for each package not returned, at the price printed on said package, and at the price of 5 cents for each paper, less the commission.

"The retailer renders no account to D. M. Ferry & Company of any sales made by him, and gives no information in regard thereto, but the representative of D. M. Ferry & Company goes annually to each retailer, makes his own investigation from the seed that the retailer has on hand, and states the account between the retailer and D. M. Ferry & Company.

"There was no agreement between the retailer and D. M. Ferry & Company that the seed would be sold at the prices named on the packages, nor as to the price at which the papers were to be sold; but the retailer was made to account to D. M. Ferry & Company for all seed not returned, at the prices printed on the packages, and at 5 cents for the papers, which is invoice prices."

"Ordinarily, where goods are consigned by one person to another for sale by the latter, the title thereto remains in the consignor; but whether the consignee is to be considered as a buyer or an agent depends upon the intention of the parties, and upon the real nature of the transaction, rather than the language which the parties may have employed. So, where the transaction is such that the consignee acquires complete dominion over the goods, with the right to sell them upon such terms and conditions as he may see fit, and is bound to pay the consignor a stipulated price therefor, it amounts to a sale and delivery, and the title passes to the consignee, and such transfer of title is not affected by the fact that the goods are not to be paid for until resold by the consignee, or that he has an option of returning the goods which he has not resold." 35 Cyc. 290, 291.

Mr. Mechem in his work on Sales, in vol. 1, § 46, has this to say: "The distinction between sale and an agency to sell is ordinarily clear and simple, but, unfortunately, many cases are presented in which the parties, for the purpose of evading the operation of some local statute, of defeating the claims of creditors, or otherwise, have made contracts involving such a confused jumble of the elements of both sale and agency that it is exceedingly difficult to determine their true character. Certain of these contracts have evidently been framed for the purpose of concealing a sale under the guise of an agency, while others have been drawn with a view to having them construed as contracts of sale or agency, as might best suit the convenience or subserve the purposes of their framers. In construing these anomalous instruments, courts look chiefly at the essential nature and preponderating features of the whole instrument, and not at the peculiar form of isolated parts of it. It matters very little what the parties have chosen to call their contract. . . . If the parties have made a contract which really operates to transfer the title, it is a sale, notwithstanding they may have labeled it a 'special selling factor appointment,' or have expressly stipulated that the alleged factor 'shall never purchase such goods for his own account.' So with regard to the use of the term 'consign.' It may express the true state of the case, and, if so, it will be given effect; or it may be a mere subterfuge, and, if it be the latter, 'there is no magic in that word which can take from the transaction its real character.'"

This is peculiarly illustrated by the cases of Arbuckle Brothers, whose contracts have been the subject of review in some of the courts of last resort, notably those of Georgia, Tennessee, and Virginia, wherein it was held that, notwithstanding the contract was called, and purports on its face to be, a "special selling factor appointment," it stipulates for a retention of title, and that the goods shall be consigned and held by the party merely as a factor, and that such factor shall never purchase such goods on his own account, and the same to be sold in name of the factor, but only as the factor of Arbuckle Brothers, and only at such prices and on such terms as said Arbuckle Brothers may give from time to time. The contract provided also for certain "allowances and commissions." There were other provisions as to payments, etc., and these courts held that the entire contract disclosed a sale, and not an agency, notwithstanding the many such expressions to be found therein. Arbuckle Bros. v. Gates, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. 496; Arbuckle Bros. v. Kirkpatrick, 98 Tenn. 221, 36 L.R.A. 285, 60 Am. St. Rep. 864, 39 S. W. 3; Snelling v. Arbuckle Bros. 104 Ga. 362, 30 S. E. 863.

Speaking of this contract, the court in the latter case says: "It appears to have been drawn for the purpose of enabling Arbuckle Brothers to 'run with the hare' or 'hold with the hounds,' according as, in the exigencies of a given case, their interest might dictate."

In reference to the same contract, the supreme court of Virginia, in above case of Arbuckle Bros. v. Gates, said: "The agreement was an attempt to accomplish that which cannot be done,—to make a sale of personal property and at the same time constitute the buyer simply an agent of the seller to hold the property until it is paid for. The two things are incompatible and cannot coexist. The agreement had in it every element of sale. It was in substance L.R.A.1917B.

and effect a sale, and must be so declared. It does not matter by what name the parties chose to designate it. That does not determine its character. The courts look beyond mere names and within to see the real nature of an agreement, and determine from all its provisions taken together, and not from the name that has been given to it by the parties, or from some isolated provision, its legal character and effect."

The following excerpt from the case of Buffum v. Deacher, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 736, 96 N. W. 352, is in point in this connection: "In all the cases it is held that the relation of the parties as principal and agent, or as vendor and vendee, is determined by the nature of the transaction, and not by the name which they give it, and the use of the words 'agent,' 'commissions,' etc., is of little significance. If the goods are delivered to the consignee under such circumstances as to confer upon him absolute dominion over them, and he becomes bound to pay a stipulated price for them at a certain time or upon the happening of any future event, the transaction amounts to a sale and delivery, and the title passes to him."

The case often cited and referred to as a leading case among cases of this character is that of Ex parte White, L. R. 6 Ch. 397. In stating the transaction between the parties, James, L. J., in his opinion, says: "Mr. Nevill was to dispose of the goods sent to him by Towle & Company, and was not to pay for them unless he disposed of them, and he was to return, at the end of every month, an account of sales that he had actually made; and then, after the lapse of another month, he was to pay in cash for the amount of the goods which he had so disposed of, according to their value as fixed by a price list sent to him. It does not appear that he ever was expected to return any particular contract, or the names of the persons with whom he had dealt. He pursued his own course in dealing with the goods, and frequently before sale he manipulated them to a very considerable extent by pressing, dyeing, and otherwise altering their character; . . . and he sold them on what terms he pleased as to price and length of credit."

The opinion then proceeds: "If he was entitled to alter them, to manipulate them, to sell them at any price that he thought fit after they had been so manipulated, and was still only liable to pay for them at a price fixed beforehand, without any reference to the price at which he had sold them, or to anything else than the fact of his having sold them in a certain month, it seems to me impossible to say that the produce of the goods so sold was the money of the consignors, or that the relation of vendor and purchaser existed between Towle & Company and the different persons to whom he sold the goods." (Italics ours.)

The opinion also says that "it has been admitted in the course of the argument that there is no magic in the word 'agency.' It is often used in commercial matters where the real relationship is that of vendor and purchaser." It was held in that case that "Mr. Nevill was in the position of a person having goods 'on sale or return.'"

In the same case from which we have just quoted, Mellish, L. J., said: "But if the consignee is at liberty, according to the contract between him and his consignor, to sell at any price he likes, and receive payment at any time he likes, but is to be bound, if he sells the goods, to pay the consignor for them at a fixed price at a fixed time, in my opinion, whatever the parties may think, their relation is not that of principal and agent. The contract of sale which the alleged agent makes with his purchasers is not a contract made on account of his principal, for he is to pay a price which may be different and at a time which may be different from those fixed by the contract. . . . If A hands over his goods to B, and B is to pay him a certain price if he sells, but is at liberty to sell on what terms he pleases, and B then sells to C, the natural inference from those facts is, beyond all doubt, that there is a sale made to B and another sale from B to C, and all the circumstances confirm the view that such was the nature of the dealing here."

The following authorities also may be cited in addition to the above, to the effect that the mere use of the words "agent," or "consignment," or "commissions," etc., does not determine the character of the contract, but that it is the duty of the court to reach the real intention of the parties and declare the relationship: Chickering v. Bastress, 130 Ill. 206, 17 Am. St. Rep. 309, 22 N. E. 542; Jackson v. State, 2 Ala. App. 226, 57 So. 110; Peoria Mfg. Co. v. Lyons, 153 Ill. 427, 38 N. E. 661; Heryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235, 26 L. ed. 160; House v. Beak, 141 Ill. 290, 33 Am. St. Rep. 307, 30 N. E. 1065; Re Wells (D. C.) 140 Fed. 752; Re Carpenter (D. C.) 125 Fed. 831; Baker v. Turner, 19 App. Div. 223, 46 N. Y. Supp. 25; Bradley A. & Co. v. McAfee (D. C.) 149 Fed. 254; People v. Newman, 99 Mich. 148, 57 N. W. 1073.

In this latter case it is said in the opinion that "calling profits 'commissions' does not change their character."

Mr. Mechem (vol. 1, § 43) thus distinguishes a sale from agency to sell in these words: "The essence of sale is, as has been seen, the transfer of the title to the goods for a price paid or to be paid. Such a transfer puts the transferee, who has procured the goods to sell again, in the attitude of an owner selling his own goods, and makes him liable to the first seller as a debtor for the price, and not as an agent for the proceeds (italics ours) of the resale. The essence of the agency to sell is the delivery of the goods to a person who is to sell them, not as his own property, but as the property of the principal (italics ours), who remains the owner of the goods and who therefore has the right to control the sale, to recall the goods, and to demand and receive their proceeds when sold, less the agent's commission, but who has no right to a price for them before sale or unless sold by the agent."

While, in the instant case, a portion of the contract has the words "sell on commission" and the word "consignment" written thereon, yet other portions (memorandum of shipment and invoice, etc.) make use of the words "sold to" and agreement to "buy back," and nothing is said as to the title to the seeds or that the retail merchant is in fact the agent of the wholesaler, and, from what is therein contained, it is difficult to determine the real intention of the parties. The agreed statement of facts however, contains the method of business, the course of dealing in reference to such transactions, and from such agreement it is disclosed that the retail merchant acquires complete dominion and control of the seeds, makes sales to whom he pleases at his own prices and on whatever terms he pleases, and makes no accounting whatever to the wholesaler. Indeed, from the agreed statement of facts it appears the retailer deals with the seed as his own. He need not sell at all, but may give away the seed or use them himself. He is to account to the wholesaler for the seed not returned at the invoice price, less the commission, when the traveling man calls and adjusts the accounts, giving the retailer credit for the unsold seed at invoice price. This settlement is not to be made as the seeds are sold, but the settlement is to be made when the "traveler calls:" that is, on demand, as it were. The retailer sold to his customer in his own name, and the wholesaler was in no manner interested in the price obtained, but merely took back the unsold seeds, allowing credit therefor at invoice prices. When sold by the retailer, the proceeds of the sale were his own, and no duty rested on him to account therefor to the wholesale dealer.

Under the agreed statement of facts as shown by the record, guided by the rules of law as found in the foregoing authorities, we think it quite clear that the retailer was not a mere agent, but was in fact a purchaser of seeds. It is shown that the retailer had the right to return the unsold seeds, and that the wholesaler agreed to buy them back at invoice prices. What, then, is the relation between the parties?

In the case of Allen v. Maury, 66 Ala. 10, it was said: "A sale may properly be defined to be 'a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing, for a price in money.' . . . If anything remains to be done by either party to the transaction, before delivery, as, for example, to determine the price, quantity, or identity of the thing sold, the title does not vest in the purchaser, but the contract is merely executory. . . . Where, however, goods are sold and delivered, the terms of sale being specified, and the vendee reserves the right to reject or return, the title passes, liable to be defeated by the exercise of this option to rescind expressed within a reasonable time."

The case of Robinson v. Fairbanks, 81 Ala. 132, 1 So. 552, is somewhat in point in this connection, and in which the court said: "In our judgment the contract was not a bailment, or a 'sale on trial' or 'approval,' in which there is no sale until an approval is given, expressly or by implication. But it more nearly resembles a contract, or bargain of 'sale or return,' which vests the property in the goods, or so much of them as remained on hand at a fixed day in the future."

See also Foley v. Felrath, 98 Ala. 176, 39 Am. St. Rep. 39, 13 So. 485; Cottonwood v. Austin, 158 Ala. 117, 48 So. 345.

"In the case of a sale or return, the property in the goods passes to the buyer at once, subject only to a defeasance by a return of the goods, unless it appears that the intention is that the title shall remain in the seller, as where payment of the price is made a condition precedent to the passing of the property. If the buyer fails to return the goods within the time limited or within a reasonable time, the sale becomes absolute." 35 Cyc. 290.

"A contract of this nature . . . constitutes usually a present sale, subject to be defeated by a condition subsequent. Until return, therefore, the title is in the vendee." 1 Mechem, Sales, § 677.

"A contract 'on sale or return' is an agreement by which goods are delivered by a wholesale dealer to a retailer, to be paid for at a certain rate if sold again by the latter, and, if not sold, to be returned." Story, Sales, § 249.

Speaking to the same subject, the court in the case of House v. Beak, 141 Ill. 290, 33 Am. St. Rep. 307, 30 N. E. 1065, says: "Such sales may be regarded as subject to a condition subsequent; that is, upon condition that, if the goods are not sold, they are to be returned. Therefore the property vests presently in the vendee, defeasible on the performance of the condition. If the defendant disables himself from performing the condition, or fails to perform it within a reasonable time, his liability to pay the price fixed becomes unconditional, and the plaintiff may declare as upon an indebitatus assumpsit. . . . The buyer may make himself liable to pay the price fixed in the agreement by refusing to return the property upon demand made for it by the seller, but, if the seller does not want the property and makes no demand for it, it is none the less true that the buyer will become liable to pay the price fixed, upon failing to return the property within a reasonable time."

We are of the opinion that the real transaction between D. M. Ferry & Company and the retail merchants, under the agreed statements of facts, was that of "sale or return," as disclosed by these authorities and definitions. The retailer was to pay for the seeds not returned at a certain price previously fixed by the parties, and at a certain time (that is, when the "traveler calls"), and he had the option of returning seeds not sold. We deem a further discussion unnecessary, and indeed recognize that this opinion is doubtless of undue length, but we trust pardonable on account of the importance of the principles involved.

We have examined the cases relied upon by counsel for appellee (Fleet v. Hertz, 201 Ill. 594, 94 Am. St. Rep. 192, 66 N. E. 858; Thornton v. Cook, 97 Ala. 632, 12 So. 403); but the contracts there were not of a similar character, nor was there such a state of facts as that disclosed here, and they are in no wise in conflict with the conclusion here reached. We therefore conclude that the transactions disclosed by this record, as appears from the agreed statement of facts, are not consignments, creating the relation of principal and agent, but are what are known as "sale or return," and that therefore the property vested in the retailer upon delivery, subject to be defeated by the condition subsequent. For the purpose of taxation, therefore, the seeds, under the agreed statement of facts, were the property of the retailer, and the appellant was not liable for such taxes.

The court below erred in giving the affirmative charge for the defendant and in refusing that asked by the plaintiff. The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and, as the cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, one will be here rendered in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum sued for.

The question of the construction of a conditional sale contract as affected by an express or implied permission to resell the goods in the ordinary course of business is covered in a note appended to Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Stanton, post, 658. The question as to when title passes under a consignment of goods for sale, with a provision in effect that the consignee shall purchase the balance of the consignment, is covered in a note appended to Parlett v. Blake, 39 L.R.A. (N. S.) 620; and the general question of the right of one person who leaves chattels in another's possession to assert title as against the latter's vendees or creditors is covered in a note appended to Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 760.

I. Construction as a question of law or fact.

The question here raised is as to the character of contracts which embody some provisions peculiar to contracts of sale, and others peculiar to contract of consignment or agency. In many of these contracts, owing to the incorporation therein of provisions peculiar to each of these classes of contracts, it frequently becomes a difficult matter to determine whether a contract is in fact one of sale, or consignment or agency. Much ingenuity has been employed by consignors in framing contracts to secure all the benefits, and at the same time avoid the disadvantages, of contracts of sale, and also to secure the benefits and avoid the detriments of agency contracts. The result is a hybrid contract, frequently involving essential elements both of sale and consignment contracts. In construing them the essential elements of each character of contract are used as tests to determine the character of the particular contract.

In contracts of this character, as in other contracts, however, the rule applies that, where the construction of any part is involved in doubt, an understanding of its meaning is to be sought in the light afforded by all the other parts of the instrument. Even though one part of the contract is somewhat repugnant to the remaining portions, which is frequently the case in this class of contracts, the true meaning of the contract as a whole is to be ascertained and enforced.<sup>1</sup> And the court will construe such a contract as a whole, weighing all the terms and provisions in connection with the reasonable and natural results of its performance, in order to gain a definite conception of the intention of the parties in this regard.<sup>2</sup> parties as gathered from the contents of the instrument as a whole, with such light as in proper cases, may be shed thereon by extrinsic proof as to their admissions and prior conduct and dealings, will control the court in determining the character of the contract. But it should be noted in this connection that the intention of the parties cannot thus control where to give effect to their express or implied intent would be violative of the principles of law applicable to contracts of sale or of agency, for a contract cannot be both. And while, as hereafter shown, the express intent of the parties is not to be ignored, nevertheless that intent is governed and controlled by the actual results accomplished by the contract.

The consignor cannot impose upon the consignee the burdens, obligations, and risks of a purchaser without at the same time exposing himself to the risks incident to the passing of the title from him to the consignee; nor can he impose upon the consignee these obligations and risks, and evade the risks due to a change in title, by asserting in the contract the expressed intention of the parties that it is to be construed as one of agency or consignment. And this pretense will not have the effect of enabling him to evade the necessity of recording the contract as one of conditional sale in order to make it valid as to the consignee's creditors or subsequent purchasers, if the effect of the contract is to charge the consignee as purchaser. Since the actual results of the contract control in its construction, the real question is as to the relation established between the parties by the contract, and this question is usually one of law to be determined from all its provisions,<sup>3</sup> except that where it is not clear whether a contract is one of sale or consignment for sale its interpretation becomes a mixed question of law and fact, based upon the acts of the parties thereunder.<sup>4</sup> As hereinafter shown, the conduct and dealings of the parties may be resorted to to determine the character of the contract, and under some circumstances these matters furnish the real test and are decisive in this regard.<sup>5</sup>

a. Use of term "agent" or "agency."

It being a rule of law relative to the construction of contracts containing provisions peculiar to contracts of sale and to contracts of agency or bailment for sale, that the parties thereto cannot change the real character of the contract by expressing therein their intentions in that regard, or by designating or agreeing as to its character, it follows that it matters but little what the parties style the agreement; its character, whether of sale or of agency, will depend upon the meaning and intent of the instrument as a whole.<sup>6</sup> For example, there is no magic in the word "agency." It is often used in contracts where the real relationship between the parties is that of seller and buyer,<sup>7</sup> and it is not uncommon for one to become the sole "agent" for the sale of specific articles obtained only by purchase.<sup>8</sup> Hence the term "agent" as used in a contract of this character does not have the effect of making it a contract of agency where other provisions make it one of absolute sale.<sup>9</sup> And the fact that numerous <sup>7</sup> In Poirier Mfg. Co. v. Kitts (1909) 18 N. D. 556, 120 N. W. 558, it is said that "the word 'agent' is employed in more than one sense, and it is frequently used to indicate that a merchant or dealer has the exclusive right to sell a specified article in certain territory, when in fact no agency exists. The dealer in no sense represents the manufacturer, but simply buys from him in the regular course of trade, and sells the specified article to the public. The public in such case, and sometimes the dealer himself, frequently refer to this as an 'agency' for the article."

Mitchell Wagon Co. v. Poole (1916) — C. C. A. —, 235 Fed. 817, declaring that the fact that the contract is designated "agent's commission agreement," and that it purports to appoint one party thereto the other's agent for the sale of farm wagons, is not conclusive as to the character of the contract, and it may be of little weight, for it may turn out to be a mere pretense.

words and phrases usually found in agency contracts are employed in a contract of sale does not make it one of agency.<sup>10</sup> Nor does the fact that a contract for the sale of the product of one of the parties thereto recites that the other party shall have the sole agency for such product in a designated locality.<sup>11</sup> And where a contract is entered into in the form of an agency contract, for the purpose of evading the statute requiring all documents reserving title in the seller to be recorded, it will not be given the protection accorded agency contracts.<sup>12</sup>

b. Use of term "consign" or "consignment."

As already pointed out in referring to the use of the term "agency" or "agent" in a contract of this character, merely designating a contract to be of a certain character does not have the effect of making it of that character, where such a construction is contrary to its clear legal effect. And this rule also applies where a contract is designated a consignment contract. While ordinarily this term imports a reservation of title in the consignor and a mere transfer to the consignee of the possession of the consigned article,<sup>13</sup> yet, where the contract by its terms is otherwise one of sale and the title to the consigned goods passes thereunder, either absolutely or contingently, the use therein of the terms "consigned" or "consignment" will not have the effect of changing the contract from one of sale to one of consignment.<sup>14</sup> But where title is reserved by the consignor in a contract containing apt words of consignment, it cannot be held to be a conditional sale rather than a bailment for sale, unless other provisions therein have the legal effect of rendering it in fact a sale without regard to the declared intent of the parties.<sup>15</sup>

c. Use of apt terms of sale.

On the other hand, where a contract purports to be one of sale, and not consignment, and describes the parties thereto as vendor and purchaser, it negatives the idea of agency, and it will be construed to be a contract of sale, especially where it evidences the intention of charging the consignee as purchaser, even though the consignor, by other provisions in the contract, seeks to secure for himself the benefits and immunities of a principal in a contract of agency.<sup>16</sup> Thus, a contract of sale is not changed into one of agency by the fact that the purchase price in amount depends upon the amount for which the purchaser sells the goods;<sup>17</sup> or that he has the right to return the goods remaining unsold at the end of the season<sup>18</sup> and the selling price is fixed by the consignor;<sup>19</sup> or by a provision that the unsold goods shall be carried over the season,<sup>20</sup> or by designating the compensation of the consignee as a commission, fixing the selling price, and in other ways restricting the manner of sale.<sup>21</sup> And the fact that the consignee was to turn over to the consignor the notes he received from purchasers of the consigned goods, to be held as collateral to his own notes, does not change the transaction from a sale to an agency.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Compare with Norton v. Melick (1896) 97 Iowa, 564, 66 N. W. 780, wherein it is declared that, where the parties have plainly and unequivocally expressed in the contract that it is an agency agreement, and not a sale, and title does not pass, there is no room for any other construction.

III. As affected by particular provisions.

a. In general.

While a contract will not be construed to pass title from one party thereto to the other, if it is ambiguous in this regard,<sup>23</sup> nevertheless, as already seen, the fact that it contains repugnant provisions will not prevent its being construed to pass the title to the subject matter. And since it is the results accomplished by a contract of this character that determine whether it is one of sale or agency, the decisive test is whether in its final results the contract creates the relationship of principal and agent or seller and purchaser, and this is, of course, to be determined by ascer-

Henney Buggy Co. v. Cathels (1899) 110 Iowa, 24, 81 N. W. 164, holding that a contract in the form of an order for buggies, and providing for a certain discount if cash is paid, is one of sale, and not of bailment, although there is a provision that the title to the articles and the proceeds of sales thereof shall remain in the consignor until the goods are paid for in cash.

<sup>17</sup> Balch v. Ashton (1880) 54 Iowa, 123, 6 N. W. 146, holding that a contract is one of sale, and not of agency, where it recites that one party thereto has received from the other a quantity of goods to be paid for by his note, the goods to be sold, and the amount to be paid therefor to depend upon the amount received from the sales.

<sup>18</sup> Robinson v. Fairbanks (1886) 81 Ala. 132, 1 So. 552, holding that a contract is a sale, and not a bailment, where it provides that the goods are to be delivered to one of the parties to be paid for at a designated time, and that the consignor shall take back any unsold goods; hence a purchaser of the goods prior to the time designated takes a good title thereto.

Furst Bros. v. Commercial Bank (1903) 117 Ga. 472, 43 S. E. 728, declaring that title passes under a sale of goods to a retail dealer, although the contract provides that he may return unsold goods, and holding that in this regard the contract differs from one providing that goods shall be sold on account of the consignor and that there shall be no sale until the goods are actually sold, since in the latter case the consignee is a mere bailee until the condition is met. He can, however, sell the goods and pass title to the purchaser.

<sup>19</sup> Ex parte Flannagan (1875) 2 Hughes, 264, Fed. Cas. No. 4,855, holding that, where a contract provided that the consignee was to be primarily responsible for all sales of the consigned goods he made, and he was to pay for the same by acceptances payable at sight or in a short time, and was to receive a commission based on the price of the article fixed in advance by the consignor, and at the end of the season to be credited with goods remaining in his hands, it constituted a sale, and not a shipment on a del credere agreement, although the terms "agency," "guaranty," and "commission" were used therein.

<sup>20</sup> Barnes v. Morse (1890) 38 Ill. App. 274, holding that, where a contract between a manufacturer and retail dealer was in the form of an order for the goods designated therein at stated prices, the mere fact that it contained a provision that goods not sold that year would be carried on next year's time did not change the character of the transaction, and that it constituted a sale, and not a bailment.

<sup>21</sup> Baldwin v. Feder (1909) 135 App. Div. 97, 119 N. Y. Supp. 1044, holding that a contract appointing one party the other's sole and exclusive selling agent in the United States for certain articles for a designated period of time, the agent agreeing to purchase a certain quantity of goods each week, and not to sell the same for less than a certain price, and to account for the goods sold at a minimum price, is a contract of sale, although there are provisions restricting the sale of the goods by the agent.

<sup>22</sup> Jackson v. State (1911) 2 Ala. App. 226, 57 So. 110, holding that when a contract provides that goods delivered for resale are to be settled for by the purchaser in cash or in notes running to the consignor, and that, if notes are taken, they shall be held as collateral to the indebtedness of the consignee for the goods consigned, it is a contract of sale, and not a consignment.

America Seeding Mach. Co. v. Stearns (1905) 109 App. Div. 192, 95 N. Y. taining its controlling provisions. If these provisions are essential or fundamental to sale contracts, and inconsistent with the essentials of an agency or consignment contract, the contract will be construed to create the relation of buyer and seller. On the other hand, if the controlling provisions are essential to an agency or consignment contract, and inconsistent with a contract of sale, the contract will be construed to create the relation of principal and agent. While it is not practical to classify the cases presenting this question so as to bring in juxtaposition all the different subsidiary and incidental provisions of the contract, an attempt has been made to bring together the cases involving the fundamental principles peculiar to these different contracts, in order to indicate the effect of such provisions in construing the contract as to its character.

<sup>24</sup> Coweta Fertilizer Co. v. Brown (1908) 89 C. C. Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Brooke (1874) 2 Sawy. 576, Fed. Cas. No. 17,980, holding that where a contract gave an exclusive right to one party to sell, in a certain territory, machines manufactured by the other party, to be paid for at designated prices, it constituted a sale; and where subsequent shipments were ordered at different times, and they were shipped at the risk of the purchaser such shipments constituted sales, and not consignments with a reservation of title.

W. 722, holding that where goods are delivered by a wholesaler to a retailer at a fixed price, the latter having the absolute control over them with power to fix the selling price, although title is reserved by the wholesaler, the transaction constitutes a sale, and not a bailment for the mutual benefit of the parties.

*King Powder Co. v. L.R.A.1917B.

b. Imposition upon consignee of obligation to pay the purchase price.

As pointed out, a contract embodying the characteristics of both a contract of sale and of agency cannot be both, and its character in this regard will be determined by the controlling provisions, the contract being construed as a whole. If such provisions are essential to a contract of sale, and are inconsistent with a contract of agency, the contract will be construed to be a sale. For example, it is essential to a contract of sale that the title shall pass absolutely or conditionally from the one party to the other, and that a correlative obligation to pay the purchase price is imposed: hence, where a contract contains these features in such form as to operate to pass the title absolutely or contingently, it will be construed to be a contract of sale.<sup>25</sup>

McKenzie v. Roper Wholesale Grocery Co. (1911) 9 Ga. App. 186, 70 S. E. 981, declaring that "if the person to whom the possession of the property is delivered gets it by virtue of a contract of purchase (i. e., gets it under such circumstances that the person parting with the possession can sue for the purchase price, irrespective of whether the person to whom the possession is delivered has sold or otherwise disposed of the goods), the contract is one of conditional sale, notwithstanding it may impose limitations upon the purchaser's right to dispose of the property and may require a definite plan of accounting. On the other hand, if the effect of the contract is that the property is delivered from the bailor to the bailee with the understanding that the title is to remain in the bailor, and the bailee does not assume initial responsibility to pay the purchase price, it is ordinarily not a conditional sale, but is a consignment, although the bailee may have the option of purchasing the goods themselves by paying a stipulated price, or may have a right to sell them to other persons upon accounting to the bailor for a stipulated sum, and though the bailee's compensation in the matter may depend upon such profit as he shall realize on the difference between the price at which the goods are consigned and the price at which they are sold, and though the bailee may be responsible to the bailor for the value of such goods as he may sell on credit, whether he collects from the purchasers or not. So that in determining whether a contract is to be construed as a conditional sale or construed as a consignment, many of the details of the transaction may be disregarded, except in so far as they may be more or less evidentiary of the one thing by which these two forms of contract are legally differentiated,—and that thing is whether the bailee upon receipt of the goods assumes liability for the purchase price. If, upon delivery of the goods, credit is extended, even though the purchaser is styled the agent of the seller, or the contract is and the relation of debtor and creditor arises between the parties, and the creditor reserves the title to the goods as security, the transaction is a conditional sale, within the purview of our statute. In consignments the bailee is merely the agent of the bailor, and the bailor cannot force him to pay for the goods, unless he has sold them, has appropriated them to his own use, or has violated the contract of agency. The fact that the bailor has a right to rescind the contract and take back his goods with or without legal process is not a test; for, where the parties so stipulate, the sale may be rescinded for the breach of a condition subsequent, and in conditional sales this is essentially so, and, of course, an agency can ordinarily be revoked."

People use of Phoenix Nursery Co. v. Midkiff (1897) 71 Ill. App. 141, holding that a contract which charges the agent absolutely for the purchase price of the consigned goods, leaving him to obtain his remuneration by selling at prices fixed by him in excess of what he paid, constitutes a sale, although there is also a provision authorizing the seller to take over all the original orders and to deliver the goods thereunder and apply the proceeds upon his account against the agent, and, when the account is satisfied, to turn over the balance of the stock, to the latter.

David Bradley Mfg. Co. v. Raynor (1896) 70 Ill. App. 639, holding that, where a contract provides that the consignee shall pay for the goods consigned at designated prices and on certain terms, and that the consignor shall carry over all goods remaining unsold, the transaction constitutes a sale.

Alpha Checkrower Co. v. Bradley (1898) 105 Iowa, 537, 75 N. W. 369, holding that, although a contract purported to be one of agency, the fact that it fixed the price the agent was to pay and the time of payment precluded the idea of agency, and made it one of sale, there being nothing in the contract requiring the agent to sell in the name of his principal, or providing that the title to the property should remain in the latter.

Warder v. Hoover (1879) 51 Iowa, 491, 1 N. W. 795, holding that the fact that the person styled as agent in a contract of this character was to pay cash on delivery for the consigned goods is of controlling importance in determining whether the contract was one of agency or sale.

Albert v. Lindau (1877) 46 Md. 334, holding that if goods are in fact sold on credit instead of being trusted to the consignee for sale as agent, or if the agreement is merely colorable, and not made in good faith, but intended, under the guise of an agency contract, merely to protect the property until sold from the creditors of the purchaser, it constitutes a sale, and not an agency.

Norris v. Boston Music Co. (Minn.) ante, 615, holding that the absence of a provision entitling the consignee to acquire title to L.R.A.1917B.

the consigned goods, or imposing upon him any obligation to pay therefor, indicates the contract to be one of consignment, and not of sale. See infra, h.

Thomson v. Batcheller (1909) 134 App. Div. 506, 119 N. Y. Supp. 577, affirmed in (1911) 201 N. Y. 551, 94 N. E. 619, holding that a contract containing appropriate and apt words for the purchase and sale of a business, and a license to use the trademarks of the seller, is a contract of sale, and not in any sense a partnership contract, and hence a proceeding for an accounting cannot be based thereon.

Weston v. Brown (1899) 158 N. Y. 360, 53 N. E. 36, holding that a contract is one of sale, and not of agency, where it recites that one party thereto agrees to sell at a designated price and ship to the other party certain articles for export trade, which are to be kept by the consignee at a designated place until sold, and provides that the title to the property and the proceeds of the sales thereof shall be and remain in the consignor until the property is paid for in full, this latter clause, however, not in any way to limit or restrict sales of goods to bona fide purchasers.

Smith v. Williams (1904) 90 App. Div. 507, 85 N. Y. Supp. 506, holding that where the consigned goods were in any event to be paid for by the consignee at a designated price, and no right was reserved to control or in any way to interfere with sales he might make, except that the title was reserved, the transaction constituted a conditional sale with the title remaining in the consignor.

Vosbury v. Mallory (1902) 70 App. Div. 247, 75 N. Y. Supp. 480, holding that a contract by which one of the parties thereto agrees to purchase an article manufactured by the other party at a certain price, and to sell the same in a certain locality, and further agrees to advertise and push such sales and make such articles his leader, is one of sale, and not of agency.

Vereinigte Pinsel-Fabriken v. Rogers (1900) 52 App. Div. 529, 31 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 37, 65 N. Y. Supp. 478, holding that under a contract providing that one party thereto shall have the sale of all the goods the other party manufactures for the United States, and for making such sales shall receive a designated commission, whether the sales are made by the one party or the other, and that, where the sales are made by the consignee from stock on hand, he will also be allowed a certain discount from the invoice price, and that he shall run no risk for goods sold except such as are sold in his name from his stock on hand—as to sales from stock on hand the title passes to the consignee at the time the sales are made.

Kellam v. Brown (1893) 112 N. C. 451, 17 S. E. 416, holding that a contract is one of sale, and not a consignment for sale, where it provides that the seller will not sell to any other person in that locality, styled one of agency<sup>25</sup> or consignment.<sup>26</sup> Thus, a person to whom goods are con-and the buyer shall not handle similar goods of any other make, and that he will keep his stock of goods up to a certain amount, and will sell at the established price.

Braunn & Fitts v. Keally (1892) 146 Pa. 519, 28 Am. St. Rep. 811, 23 Atl. 389, holding to be one of sale, and not of agency, a contract providing that the goods are to be billed at certain prices less a stipulated discount, the consignee to pay the freight and to receive for his services in selling the goods whatever price he obtains over and above the purchase price and the freight.

Ruthrauff v. Hagenbuch (1868) 58 Pa. 103, holding that, as between the parties, a contract is one of sale where it recites that the one party thereto agrees to and does sell to the other party certain property at a designated price, and the latter agrees to resell the same for the best price he can obtain, and account for all he receives over and above the stipulated price.

Bridgeport Organ Co. v. Guldin (1894) 3 Pa. Dist. R. 649, holding that a radical distinction between a bailment and conditional sale is the fact that in the former there is a right or duty to return the property, while in the latter there is a liability to retain and pay for it.

Texas Brewing Co. v. Templeman (1896) 90 Tex. 277, 38 S. W. 27, holding to be one of sale, and not of agency, a contract by one party to give to another the sole representation and sale of its products in a certain territory and to furnish such products at designated prices to be paid for by the consignee with his acceptances with each and every invoice, the consignor having also placed this construction upon the contract by suing thereon for the price of goods received thereunder.

Compare with Mitchell Wagon Co. v. Poole, infra, note 33.

<sup>25</sup> Bendix v. Staver Carriage Co. (1912) 174 Ill. App. 589, holding that, even though a contract is styled an agency agreement and purports to grant the exclusive right to sell the consignor's product in a certain territory, as between the parties it is nevertheless a contract of sale where the consignee is prohibited from contracting or selling in the consignor's name or behalf, and is required to pay cash on delivery of the consigned goods.

Mennis v. E. N. Manning & Co. (1907) 136 Ill. App. 406, holding that, although words of agency are used in a contract under which goods are delivered for resale, the contract is nevertheless one of absolute sale where there is no provision for the return of the goods if unsold, and the consignee is required to remit for the goods within a designated time after receiving them, without reference to whether or not he has sold them, and there are no restrictions upon the price or terms for which he is to make sales.

where a contract purports to be an agency contract and provides that the agent may return the unsold portion of the goods and have his account credited with the amount paid for them, and also that the goods shall be sold for cash on delivery, the transaction is a sale and the title to goods delivered without payment passes to the consignee, and he cannot be held liable for the wrongful conversion of the goods or the proceeds of the sale thereof.

People v. Newman (1894) 99 Mich. 148, 57 N. W. 1073, holding that, although styled an agency contract, the contract is nevertheless one of sale where it provides that the agent shall account at a certain price for all goods received, and that for his commission he is to have all he sells the goods for over and above this amount, with no restrictions upon his power to sell, even though there is also a provision reserving title in the consignor. In this case the consignee was held to have sold the goods (beer) on his own account without complying with the law relative to the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Com. v. Banker Bros. Co. (1909) 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 101, affirmed in (1911) 222 U. S. 210, 56 L. ed. 168, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38, holding that a contract between the manufacturer of automobiles and a retail dealer, by which the former agrees to sell to the latter its automobiles for a designated price to be paid in cash, containing agreements with reference to the protection of the territory given the dealer and for the cancellation of the contract under certain circumstances, is a contract of sale, and not of agency.

Seyfert v. Herron (1881) 11 W. N. C. (Pa.) 72, holding that a contract which recites that one of the parties thereto is to have the sole agency in a certain locality for the sale of the goods of the other party, the former binding himself to act as agent for no other person in the sale of similar goods during the continuance of the contract, and the latter party agreeing to sell his goods to the agent for a certain price and on designated terms, constitutes a sale, and not an agency.

Texas Brewing Co. v. Anderson (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 737, holding that, although the consignee is described in the contract as the agent of the consignor, the contract is nevertheless one of sale, and not of agency, where it provides that during the term of the agency the consignor shall furnish his manufactured product to the consignee for sale at a certain place, the latter to pay a certain fixed price therefor and to secure the payment thereof.

Compare with Conable v. Lynch (1876) 45 Iowa, 84, holding that, where a contract purports to be one of agency, it will be so construed although there is a provision that the agent is to guarantee all notes taken for the purchase price, and that he will sell all the property consigned, and signed at a fixed price, to be sold at such price and on such terms as he may fix, is a purchaser, and not an agent,<sup>57</sup> and an agreement to supply a manufactured product at a certain price and to give the exclusive right of sale to the consignee is a contract of sale, and not of agency.<sup>58</sup>

So a contract has been held to be a sale, and not a bailment, although it purported to appoint one of the parties the agent of the other for the sale of the latter's product in a certain territory, and contained other provisions indicating that the contract was one of agency, where, however, it contained a guaranty by the agent that he would sell the articles within a stipulated time, and an agreement to advance a portion of the purchase price and execute his notes for the balance, for the payment of which the consignor agreed to take notes given by the purchasers of the property.<sup>59</sup> And a contract has been held to be one of sale, and not of agency, notwithstanding the inclusion therein of apt words of agency, where the price to be paid by the consignee for the consigned goods was fixed, and he was required to execute his notes in payment thereof.<sup>60</sup> if he does not he will pay for such goods as remain unsold, the title to remain in the principal until payment, hence a sale made by the agent in payment of his own debt is invalid.

<sup>55</sup> Re Linforth, K. & Co. (1877) 4 Sawy. 370, Fed. Cas. No. 8,369, holding a contract in form a consignment contract to be one of sale where it required that the consigned goods be paid for by the consignee at a certain time.

Peoria Mfg Co. v. Lyons (1894) 153 Ill. 427, 38 N. E. 661, holding that, although in form, and according to the designation given it by the parties, an agreement was for the consignment of goods for sale, and although the contract provided that the difference between the selling price and the purchasing price should constitute a commission for the retail dealer, and that the proceeds of each sale, whether in cash or notes, were to be delivered to the consignor, and the latter was authorized to require the return of all unsold goods and also to require the shipment of goods to other points before the expiration of the contract yet, where it in fact provided that the purchaser should execute and deliver his note for the purchase price, and there was no provision entitling the consignee to return the goods, it nevertheless constituted a sale of the goods when delivered, and they were subject to levy by the creditors of the consignee.

Boehm v. Griebenow (1898) 78 Ill. App. 675, holding that, where goods are delivered under an alleged consignment contract by the terms of which the consignee is entitled to fix the price of resale, the only restriction being with reference to the payment of the purchase price when a given quantity of the goods are sold, the transaction constitutes a sale, and not a consignment, although the latter term is employed in describing it.

A. A. Cooper Wagon & Buggy Co. v. Wooldridge (1903) 98 Mo. App. 648, 73 S. W. 724, holding that a contract reciting a sale to the consignee of certain articles at a designated price payable at specific times is one of sale, notwithstanding the inclusion therein of the words, "terms, commission contract."

Arbuckle Bros. v. Kirkpatrick (1897) 98 L.R.A.1917B.

Tenn. 221, 36 L.R.A. 285, 60 Am. St. Rep. 854, 39 S. W. 3, holding that a contract was a sale although designated a consignment, where the consignee was required to remit for goods within a designated time without reference to whether or not they had been sold, and that hence the consignor could not, as principal, hold the purchasers of the consigned goods for the amounts they were owing thereon to the consignee.

Yoder v. Haworth (1898) 57 Neb. 150, 73 Am. St. Rep. 496, 77 N. W. 377, holding that, although a contract provides that the goods shall be sold on commission on account of the manufacturer, it is nevertheless one of sale, and not of agency, where the price to be paid for the goods by the consignee is fixed, but not the selling price or terms, except that the sales are to be for cash or good notes running to the consignor and guaranteed by the consignee,

But very similar contracts containing words of agency have been held to be of agency, and not of sale, although the consignee was required to pay for unsold articles, where, however, the consignee in effect agreed to act in a fiduciary capacity and the consignor reserved the title to the unsold goods and to the net proceeds of goods sold.<sup>30a</sup> In general, however, to require a contract to be construed to be a sale, it is not essential that the title shall absolutely and unconditionally pass to the purchaser. If it imposes upon him an obligation to pay, it is one of sale, although the seller reserves title to the property until such payment is made, with the express or implied authority given to the purchaser to sell it in the ordinary course of business.<sup>31</sup> which, however, are to be held as collateral to notes executed by the consignee to the consignor at the time the goods were delivered, the contract further providing that unsold goods shall be held by the consignee subject to the order of the consignor, the consignee, however, having the privilege of paying for and keeping the goods.

And see Moline Plow Co. v. Rodgers (Kan.) infra, holding to be a sale an order for goods by which the consignee was to give his notes for the purchase price, and secure the same by notes taken from subpurchasers, and was to pay for unsold goods or store to same for the consignor at the latter's option. There were two contracts construed in this case. One was held to be a sale and the other an agency contract. The contracts were very similar except that, in the one construed to be a sale, the purchaser was to execute his notes for the purchase price and turn over to the consignor as collateral thereto notes he received from resales, while the contract construed to be one of agency required the consignee to settle for the goods by turning over to the consignor notes he received from resales.

<sup>30a</sup> Martin v. Stratton-White Co. (1896) 1 Ind. Terr. 394, 37 S. W. 833, holding that the fact that the consignee guaranteed to sell all the consigned goods within a specified time, and to settle for any unsold if called upon by the consignor to do so, does not make the transaction a sale where the contract contains a provision authorizing the consignor to resume possession of the consigned goods at any time, and retains title to them and to the proceeds of any sold by the consignee.

Moline Plow Co. v. Rodgers (1894) 53 Kan. 743, 42 Am. St. Rep. 317, 37 Pac. 111, holding that a contract is one of agency where it provides that a person appointed as agent shall settle for the property by purchasers' notes or cash, and that all articles remaining unsold at the end of the season shall be settled for by the consignee's notes or stored as the property of the consignor.

St. Paul Harvester Co. v. Nicolin (1886) 36 Minn. 232, 30 N. W. 763.

Re Chambers (1897) 17 App. Div. 340, 45 N. Y. Supp. 264, holding that a contract to manufacture and ship goods for sale on commission, which fixes a minimum price at which the goods are to be sold, but requires that the goods shall be accounted for at the prices at which they are sold less an agreed commission, the goods to be L.R.A.1917B.

received and sold by the consignee as factor or agent of the consignor, and to remain the absolute property of the consignor until sold, he, however, having an option to charge the consignee a designated price for the goods remaining unsold at a certain time, creates the relation of principal and agent, entitling the principal to notes received by the agent for goods sold.

<sup>31</sup> Re Carpenter (1903) 125 Fed. 831, holding that, where goods are to be settled for by the notes of the consignee, and the proceeds of the sale of the goods are to belong to the consignor until the consignee's obligations are paid, and the title to the goods is also to remain in him, the transaction constitutes a sale, and not an agency, although the consignee is described as an agent.

Sutton v. Baker (1897) 91 Minn. 12, 97 N. W. 420, holding that, although designating the purchaser as the agent of the seller and reserving the right to cancel the agency and appoint another agent under certain conditions, the contract is nevertheless one of sale, where the price of the articles and the number and kind of each to be furnished are specifically fixed, and there is an absolute promise to pay the purchase price within a stated time, and the resale of the goods is entirely within the control of the purchaser, and there is no provision for the return of any unsold goods, except a provision that if the seller cancel the contract, he is authorized to take back the unsold goods.

Poirier Mfg. Co. v. Kitts (1909) 18 N. D. 556, 120 N. W. 558, holding that, as between the parties, a contract is one of sale, and not of agency, where it provides that the dealer is to purchase for his trade articles of the other party for designated prices and on designated terms, and contains an acceleration clause authorizing the consignor to declare the whole amount of the purchase price due under certain circumstances, the consignor also reserving title to the goods until sold by the consignee in the regular course of business; and this is true although the term "agent" is used in the contract in referring to the consignee.

Arbuckle Bros. v. Gates (1898) 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. 496, holding that, although the contract described the consignee as a factor and purported to create an agency, expressly stipulating that the goods were to be sold by the consignee merely as a factor of the consignor, nevertheless the contract will be construed to be one of sale

But, as already suggested, the express intent of the parties as to the character of a contract cannot be ignored; hence, where the contract describes the parties as consignor and consignee, it cannot be held to be a conditional sale rather than a bailment for sale, unless the legal effect of the contract construed as a whole is to render it in fact a sale regardless of the declared intent of the parties that it shall constitute only a consignment.<sup>32</sup> And where the controlling provisions are inconsistent with the theory of a sale, and consistent with and essential to a contract of consignment, the contract will be construed to be a consignment and to create an agency, although it embraces provisions imposing at least a contingent obligation upon the consignee to pay for the goods.<sup>33</sup> For example, it has been held that provisions reserving title in the consignor and requiring the consignee to remit the cash proceeds and to insert, in all notes that he takes for the purchase price of the consigned articles he sells on credit, a provision reserving title in the consignor, effectually fixes the character of the contract as one of consignment, although it also contains a provision that at the option of the consignor the consignee shall give his note for the purchase price of unsold goods, and shall guarantee the payment of all notes taken for articles sold.<sup>34</sup> And apparently controlling effect has been given the provision by which the consignor reserved title to the property until paid for, when construed in connection with a provision by which the consignee agreed to buy and pay for all goods remaining unsold at a certain time.<sup>35</sup> And a provision that the consignee was to pay the wholesale price for all the articles he received has been held to be limited in its operation to the balance due for goods actually sold, and hence not to have the effect of converting an otherwise consignment or agency contract into one of sale.<sup>36</sup> As between the parties it has been held that, and to pass title to the property, where in effect it amounted to a sale of the goods for a fixed price payable at a designated time, and reserved the title in the consignor, there being no provision for the return of the goods, and the payment of the purchase price not depending upon the consignee's selling them.

South Bend Iron Works v. Cottrell (1887) 31 Fed. 254, holding that a contract designated as one of consignment and agency is not changed by a provision by which the consignee guaranteed the sale of the consigned goods and agreed to pay for unsold goods either in good notes or other valuable consideration, where the effect of these latter clauses was restricted by a provision that the consignor would carry over to the next season all unsold goods.

Re Columbus Buggy Co. (1906) 74 C. C. A. 611, 143 Fed. 859, holding that the fact that a contract provides that the consignee may fix the selling price and may retain the difference between the consigned price and such selling price to recompense him does not constitute the agreement a sale where it does not impose upon the consignee an obligation to pay the purchase price and a correlative obligation on the consignor to transfer the title.

Cortland Wagon Co. v. Sharvy (1893) 52 Minn. 216, 53 N. W. 1147, holding that where a contract purports to be a consignment for sale and there is no agreement to transfer the property to the consignee, it is a consignment, and not a conditional sale.

Bridgeport Organ Co. v. Guldin (1894) 3 Pa. Dist. R. 649, holding that the fact that a contract of bailment contains a provision for the giving of notes by the consignee for the accommodation of the consignor, and not in payment of the consigned goods, does not change the contract from one of consignment to one of sale.

Norton v. Melick (1896) 97 Iowa, 564, 66 N. W. 780, holding that a contract styled an agency contract, by which the consignee agreed to receive and sell the goods of the consignor and at designated times to remit for all goods sold, the consignor reserving the title and right of possession until paid in full, was a consignment contract, and not a sale, although the contract also contained a provision by which the consignee agreed to buy any of the goods remaining unsold at a certain time.

And for a case applying this doctrine to the extent of putting it in conflict with the cases cited in notes 24 and 39, see Mitchell Wagon Co. v. Poole (1916) — C. C. A. —, 235 Fed. 817, holding that a contract was one of agency where it purported to be of that character and its terms were consistent therewith, except a provision giving the agent an option to purchase the property and receive a certain cash discount, and a provision by which he agreed to purchase the unsold property at the end of the selling season, or if he sold out or closed out his business.

so far as concerns the breach of such a contract, if it purports to be one of agency it will be so construed, although it embraces terms sufficient to pass title to the property and imposes on the consignee an obligation to pay the purchase price.<sup>37</sup>

So, where a contract purporting to be one of agency provided that the agent shall execute to the principal his notes to cover the purchase price for the articles received, and that the execution of such notes shall not have the effect to pass the title in the property to the agent, it was held that, as a matter of law, the execution of the notes did not have the effect of changing the contract from one of agency to one of sale.<sup>38</sup>

to ship certain goods and refill the order as often as he saw fit to do so, unless the contract was canceled by one of the parties, and the consignee agreed to receive and sell the goods for designated prices, and upon demand to pay the wholesale price of all articles received. This latter provision was held to be of limited operation when construed in connection with other provisions of the contract indicating that the consignee was to act as agent for the consignor; for example, a provision limiting the scope of the consignor's warranty to the purchasers from the consignee.

Baskerville v. Bates (1913) 123 Minn. 339, 143 N. W. 909, holding that, although a contract for the purchase of articles for the purpose of resale provided that the agent was to remit each week an amount equal to one half his receipts from the business, and that upon the termination of the contract he was to settle in cash for the balance due the seller, it was nevertheless in the nature of an agency contract, and not one of absolute sale.

Davis v. Woolsey (1914) 34 S. D. 236, 147 N. W. 977, holding, that as between the parties, a contract was one of agency, and not of sale, where it required one party to ship to the other certain goods to be sold at retail at prices fixed by the consignor, the consignee to remit weekly an amount equal to one half the proceeds of such sales, to make weekly reports of the business done by him, and also, upon the termination of the contract, to settle in cash for any balance due the consignor. To the same effect, under a similar contract, is Baskerville v. Culver (1914) 33 S. D. 424, 146 N. W. 595.

c. Optional provision as to payment for consigned goods.

1. Option of consignee.

Where goods are received to be sold on commission, one of the tests to determine whether the transaction constitutes a sale or an agency is the question as to whether or not the alleged agent is given the option to pay for the goods and keep them; if he is, the transaction constitutes a sale and title passes to the consignee as a matter of law.<sup>39</sup> When the identical article is to be returned in the same or some altered form, the contract is one of bailment, and the title to the property is not changed. But when there is no obligation to return the and was not to sell them at retail below the regular retail prices, and the consignor reserved the right to buy back from the consignee any unsold goods and also to terminate the agency.

<sup>38</sup> John Deere Plow Co. v. McDavid (1905) 137 Fed. 802, holding that, as to a trustee in bankruptcy of the consignee, the contract is one of agency, and not of absolute sale, where it provides for the consignment of goods for sale for cash, and that title thereto shall not pass to the consignee, who agrees to return unsold goods at any time on request to do so by the consignor. And this is true although the contract further provides that the consignee shall settle for the consigned goods at certain prices, either in cash or by purchasers' notes, and where purchasers' notes are taken that the consignee shall guarantee the payment thereof.

Charles H. Childs & Co. v. Waterloo Wagon Co. (1899) 37 App. Div. 242, 57 N. Y. Supp. 520, affirmed in (1901) 167 N. Y. 576, 60 N. E. 1108, holding that, where a contract purports to be one of agency and requires that the agent at a stated time shall account in cash or bank notes for articles sold by him, and that he shall sell within a stated time all the articles received, the contract is one of agency, and not of sale, as against creditors of the agent receiving goods in payment of an existing indebtedness; and this is true although at the time the goods are received notes have been given by the agent for the purchase price, the contract, however, providing that the execution of such notes shall not have the effect of passing title.

Re Rabenau (1902) 118 Fed. 471, holding that where, by the terms of a contract styled a consignment contract, all risk of the consigned goods rested upon the consignee, and he was entitled to pay for them at any time, and the consignor had the option to require him to purchase unspecific article, and another thing of value may be returned, the title to the property passes, and the transaction constitutes a sale with an obligation upon the part of the purchaser to pay the purchase price.<sup>40</sup>

This test to determine the character of a contract of this kind, while undoubtedly sound, is nevertheless subject to misconstruction. Contracts involving a provision authorizing the consignee to sell the consigned goods and turn the proceeds, or a specific portion of them, over to the consignor, should be distinguished in this regard from contracts containing a provision authorizing the consignee to sell the consigned goods and upon such sale pay a designated sum as the purchase price. In the latter case, of course, the consignee is giving to the consignor something of value other than the consigned goods or the proceeds of their sale; hence the contract is properly a sale, and not an agency or consignment contract. This rule applies whenever the language of the contract indicates that the purchaser buys the consigned goods and agrees to pay for them after he sells them. For, as subsequently shown,<sup>41</sup> in such case the sale is conditional and title passes upon the resale, and the proceeds of the sale belong to the consignee, the resale creating between him and the consignor the relation of debtor and creditor. But this is not true where the purchaser is required to account for or turn over to the consignor the proceeds he receives from the sale of the goods intrusted with him for that purpose. In such case the title to the goods never vests in him, but passes directly from the consignor to the purchaser from the consignee, and the title to the proceeds of the sale passes directly from such purchaser to the consignor; hence the consignee does not return another thing of value, as that term is used in stating this test.<sup>42</sup>

3. Option of consignor.

The rule applicable to cases where the consignee is given the option to return something other than the consigned goods in payment thereof is based upon the doctrine of conditional or contingent sale. The right conferred by the consignor upon the consignee, to return for the consigned goods something other than the goods themselves, or the proceeds thereof, is inconsistent with the essential features of an agency or consignment contract, and consistent only with a contract of sale. A different question, however, is presented as regards an option reserved to the consignor of treating the contract as a sale. In such case the rule is that a provision in a contract reserving to the consignor the right to require the consignee to pay for unsold goods, either in cash or by note, does not in and of itself have the effect of making a contract, otherwise one of consignment or agency, one of sale.<sup>44</sup> But where the consignor exercises the agreement on the part of the consignee to pay for the unsold goods, but merely a conditional agreement to do so in event of his default, provided the consignor terminates the contract and elects to have the unsold goods paid for in the manner designated.

<sup>44</sup> Re Harris (1914) 214 Fed. 482, holding that the fact that the consignor reserves the option, on default of the consignee, to retake all unsold goods, or require the consignee to pay for the same in notes, does not have the effect of making the transaction a sale instead of a bailment, where there is no absolute L.R.A.1917B.

Lenz v. Harrison (1893) 148 Ill. 598, 36 N. E. 567, holding to be one of consignment, and not of sale, a contract by which the consignee agreed to act as agent for the consignor to sell the latter's goods at a designated place, the consignee to transmit all money received from sales to, and take all notes for sales in the name of, the consignor, and guarantee the payment thereof, although the contract also contained a provision that the consignee was to take all the consigned articles unsold at the end of the year and pay for the same by his note if required to do so by the consignor, it, however, expressly providing that this stipulation was not to be a positive sale of the property to the consignee.

D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Rich (1894) 53 Ill. App. 661, holding that, where a contract between a manufacturer and retail option and asserts against the consignee a demand for the purchase price, the title passes to the latter, even though the contract was originally one of consignment or agency.<sup>45</sup>

d. Retention by consignor of title to proceeds of sale.

As heretofore pointed out, one of the essential features of a sale is an absolute obligation on the part of the purchaser to pay the purchase price. On the other hand, a leading feature of an agency contract is the fact that the agent is not primarily liable for the purchase price, except as he is responsible for the proceeds of sales which come into his hands. This distinction between contracts of sale and of agency frequently determines to which class of contracts a particular contract belongs. If a contract provides that the proceeds of sales by the consignee are the property of the consignor and must be remitted to him by the consignee, less, perhaps, a designated commission to be deducted by the latter, it constitutes a consignment or agency contract, and not a sale.<sup>46</sup> dealer provided that the manufacturer might require the return of any unsold machines at the close of the season, or a settlement therefor by the dealer executing his notes to be indorsed by some responsible party, the title to the unsold machines remained in the manufacturer, as to the creditors of the retail dealer, where the latter did not give a note of the kind designated in the contract for the purchase price of the unsold goods.

Moline Plow Co. v. Rodgers (1894) 53 Kan. 743, 42 Am. St. Rep. 317, 37 Pac. 111, holding to be one of agency, and not of sale, a contract which provided that the settlement for the purchase price of the goods covered thereby should be by notes of the persons purchasing the property of the consignee, with the privilege in the latter to pay the purchase money in cash and receive a certain discount, with the further provision that any articles remaining unsold at the close of the season shall be settled for by the notes of the consignee or the property shall be stored for the consignor, at the latter's option.

Weir Plow Co. v. Porter (1884) 82 Mo. 23, holding that, as to the creditors of the consignee, the contract was one of agency, and not of sale; where by its terms a manufacturer was to furnish a retail dealer with certain articles for resale in a certain territory for a designated commission, at a price designated by the consignor, the sales to be for cash or notes of the purchasers running to the consignor and guaranteed by the consignee, the contract also containing a provision entitling the consignor to cancel the contract at any time and retake all goods remaining unsold, and a provision entitling him at his option to have goods unsold at the end of the season kept over for him by the consignee or returned.

Milburn Mfg. Co. v. Peak (1896) 89 Tex. 209, 34 S. W. 102, holding that a contract was one of agency, and not of sale, where it provided that one party was to manufacture and ship to the other certain articles to be resold by the other for a designated commission, at prices fixed by the consignor, sales not for cash to be settled for by purchasers' notes payable to the consignor, payment to be guaranteed by the consignee, who agreed to pay cash L.R.A.1917B.

for such notes as were not paid within a certain time after maturity, the consignor reserving title to the property and the right to retake unsold goods, and also to terminate the agreement at any time, with the further right to require the consignee at the end of the season to return the property unsold, to hold and care for it as the property of the consignor, or to pay for it by his notes.

<sup>46</sup> Ludvig v. American Woolen Co. (1913) 231 U. S. 522, 58 L. ed. 345, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, holding that an agreement that the consignee is to sell the goods for and in behalf of the consignor, collect the amounts due therefor, and immediately pay the same over to the latter after deducting the difference between the selling price and the invoice price, and that upon the termination of the contract unsold goods are to be returned, constitutes a bailment, and not a sale, as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the consignee.

Re Reynolds (1912) 203 Fed. 162, holding to one of bailment to sell, a contract retaining title to proceeds of sales, although requiring the consignee, at the consignor's option, to purchase all unsold goods at the end of the selling season, and at the end of each month to settle for all goods sold either by cash from the proceeds or, where they are sold on credit, by note.

Re Smith (1911) 192 Fed. 574, holding that, where a dealer went into bankruptcy shortly after receiving property under a contract in which he was styled the agent of the consignor to sell fertilizer described therein at designated prices, the proceeds of the sales to belong to the consignor and to be held by the consignee in trust, the transaction constitutes an agency, and not a sale.

Thornton v. Cook (1893) 97 Ala. 630,

And it is not essential that the contract expressly retains the proceeds of the sales; it is sufficient in this regard if it by fair implication imposes upon the con-

12 So. 403, holding that an agreement by which the consignee is to resell the goods as agent for the consignor, and upon such resale pay a certain price for them out of the proceeds, constitutes a sale upon condition, and the property is not subject to execution by the creditors of the consignee.

Harris v. Coe (1898) 71 Conn. 157, 41 Atl. 552.

National Bank v. Goodyear (1892) 90 Ga. 711, 16 S. E. 962, holding that, as to creditors of the consignee, a transaction did not constitute a sale where the consignee was to receive, hold, sell, and account for and pay over the proceeds of goods less a certain compensation as agent, —the sale, payment by the purchaser, delivery to him, and remittance to the consignor to be simultaneous action.

Fleet v. Hertz (1903) 201 Ill. 594, 94 Am. St. Rep. 192, 66 N. E. 858, holding that, where goods are consigned for resale on the account of the consignor, the proceeds to be held in trust and turned over to him within a designated time, and the consignee has authority to sell at such prices above a minimum price as he may fix, and upon designated credit, and there is no provision entitling him to acquire title to the goods, the transaction creates an agency to sell, and is not an absolute sale as against the creditors of the agent.

Brown v. John Church Co. (1894) 55 Ill. App. 615, holding that, where the contract between a manufacturer and a dealer provides that the latter receives goods from the former on consignment and for sale for his benefit, the proceeds of the sale to belong to the manufacturer until the goods are paid for, and the dealer agrees upon demand to deliver all unsold goods, it constitutes a consignment of goods for sale, and not an absolute sale. The court distinguished Chickering v. Bastress (1889) 130 Ill. 206, 17 Am. St. Rep. 309, 22 N. E. 542, and Peoria Mfg. Co. v. Lyons (1894) 55 Ill. App. 41, on the ground that the contracts construed in those cases provided that the retail dealer was to execute notes payable to the seller for the goods received and the proceeds of the sales were to apply on these notes.

Rosencranz & W. Co. v. Hanchett (1889) 30 Ill. App. 283, holding that, under a delivery of goods to a retail dealer to be sold by him for cash at not less than the invoice price, his compensation being the amount he sells the goods for above that price, he agreeing to turn the proceeds of the sale to the extent of the invoice price over to the consignor, title to the goods does not vest in the consignee, and they are not subject to the claims of the creditors.

Holbert v. Keller (1913) 161 Iowa, 723, 142 N. W. 962, holding that a contract is a bailment, and not a sale, where it provides that one party shall deliver to the other a number of breeding horses to be sold at a fixed price, the proceeds to be accounted for and the title to remain in the owner with the right to recall any of the animals at any time, although payment of the notes taken for the purchase price is to be guaranteed by the consignee.

McKinney v. Grant (1907) 76 Kan. 779, 93 Pac. 180, holding that a contract is one of agency, and not of sale, where it is styled a consignment for sale for the consignor, and provides that the consignee shall account for each article as sold, and return articles unsold at the request of the consignor, who retains title thereto, although there is also a provision that the consignee shall pay, to cover the depreciation of the goods, interest upon the purchase price from the time of the consignment of the goods to him.

Walker v. Butterick (1870) 105 Mass. 237, holding that a contract was a consignment contract, and not a sale, where by its terms the consignee was to take goods from the consignor and at designated times remit the proceeds of sales at prices charged by the latter.

Ferd Heim Brewing Co. v. Linck (1892) 51 Mo. App. 478, holding that, where a contract provides that one party thereto shall furnish goods to the other to be sold by the latter as agent, and that he is to account for the proceeds, and there is no provision by which the agent can acquire title to the property, it is a consignment contract, and not a sale, and the creditors of the consignee can acquire no rights in the property as against the consignor.

Lance v. Butler (1904) 135 N. C. 419, 47 S. E. 488, holding that a consignment of goods to be sold for cash at retail for the consignor, at a certain price, the proceeds to be paid to him until a designated amount is obtained, and the balance of the proceeds to be divided between the consignor and consignee, constitutes a contract of consignment, and not a sale, as to a subsequent mortgage of the goods of the consignee, with which the consigned goods have been mixed.

Barteldes Seed Co. v. Border Queen Mill & Elevator Co. (1909) 23 Okla. 675, 101 Pac. 1130, holding that a contract is one of agency, and not of sale, where it purports to bind one party thereto as the other's agent for the sale of its product at a certain place for a specified commission, the property to be sold at a price fixed by the seller, and the title to remain in him until it is sold, together with the proceeds of such sales, and the agent to remit the proceeds upon designated dates.

Keystone Watch Case Co. v. Fourth Street Nat. Bank (1900) 104 Pa. 535, 45 Atl. 328, holding that, where goods are consigned to a retail dealer in trust to sell for the consignor for not less than a designated cash price, unless consent to sell on credit is expressly given, the sales to be made and billed by the consignee as agent for the consignor, and the proceeds signee the duty of remitting the proceeds.<sup>47</sup> The rule also applies although the purchase price is to be paid by notes given by purchasers of the consignee, to be remitted at once, the consignor reserving the right at any time to terminate the contract and take back the unsold goods, the transaction amounts to a bailment, and not a sale.

Hamilton v. Billington (1894) 163 Pa. 76, 43 Am. St. Rep. 780, 29 Atl. 904, holding an agreement to hold goods in trust for the owners, with liberty to sell the same for their account and pay over to them the proceeds, is a bailment for sale, and not a sale.

Becker v. Smith (1868) 59 Pa. 469, holding an agreement that one party may sell for the other articles on commission, and deposit the proceeds in a certain bank, and when they reach a certain sum the balance of the property shall belong to the consignee, is a bailment, and not a conditional sale.

Hamilton v. Willing (1889) 73 Tex. 603, 11 S. W. 843, holding that a contract is one of agency, and not of sale, where it provides that one party thereto shall furnish to the other goods to be sold on commission, the goods and proceeds of the sale to be the property of the consignor, the sales to be reported and remitted for semimonthly, and the transaction to terminate at the option of the consignor; and that the consignor, as against the administrator of the consignee, is entitled to the unsold goods which were in the possession of the consignee at the time of his death.

Barnes v. Darby (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 468, 44 S. W. 1029, holding that, as to creditors of the consignee, the title did not pass upon the receipt by him of goods consigned for sale on account of the consignor, the consignee to remit the entire proceeds of the sales, and the consignor to apply the amount due the consignee as his commission upon an indebtedness owing by the latter to the former.

Killers Music House v. Fairbanks (1914) 80 Wash. 379, 141 Pac. 885, holding to be a consignment, and not a conditional sale, an agreement to take a consignment of articles and sell the same at a stated price, unsold articles to be subject to the order of the consignor after the lapse of a specified time after shipment to the consignee, who agreed to pay a certain per cent interest on the billing price of the articles for such length of time as the consignor permitted them to remain after such time, and to remit cash received from sales, and to take only approved notes for the articles sold if sold on credit. The contract being one of consignment, a subsequent purchaser acquired no title thereto where he took an article in payment of a pre-existing indebtedness.

for as fast as sold, the title to remain in the consignor until they are sold, no title passes to the consignee, and the latter cannot assign to a third person a cause of action for the detention of the machines, except, perhaps, to the extent of his interest therein, which is his special property in the machines under the consignment.

Wight v. Wood (1867) 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 471, holding that where an agent receives property to be sold, and as compensation he is to have a certain share of the proceeds of the sale, the contract gives him no title to any part of the property received.

Thompson v. Paret (1880) 94 Pa. 275, holding that an agreement to consign goods for sale, the invoice prices to be paid at least weekly and all above such prices to be retained by the consignee as his compensation, the consignor reserving the right at any time to reclaim the unsold goods, is a bailment, and the consignee has no interest in the goods subject to levy or sale by his creditors.

McCullough v. Porter (1842) 4 Watts & S. (Pa.) 177, 39 Am. Dec. 68, holding that an agreement to furnish goods to be sold at invoice prices, the consignee remitting the invoice price and retaining the balance for his own use, is a bailment, and the goods are not subject to the claims of the consignee's creditors.

Kimball Co. v. First Nat. Bank (1901) 1 Tenn. Ch. App. 505, holding that a contract is one of agency, and not of sale, as to the mortgagee of the consignee of goods received thereunder, where it provides that the consignee will take the goods on consignment and handle the same exclusively, and will sell at fixed prices and account for sales at designated times, either in cash or purchasers' notes, the payment of which is to be guaranteed by the consignee and the same to be credited upon his account, the notes representing a sale to be treated as a separate transaction, and when the wholesale price of the article is collected, the balance to belong to the consignee or be credited upon his account; and also that the goods are to be insured for the benefit of the consignor, the title to remain in him with the right to have the unsold goods returned after they have been in possession of the consignee for sale a certain length of time, and all unsold goods to be held subject to the order of the consignor in the event of the termination of the agency by either party.

Stein Double Cushion Tire Co. v. Wm. T. Fulton Co. (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 159 S. W. 1013, holding that, as between the parties and as affected by the monopoly and conspiracy against trade laws, a contract was one of consignment, and not of sale, where the consignor agreed to furnish the consignee goods to a designated amount, to be stored in the name and under the control of the consignor, and insured other provisions of the contract being consistent with a contract of agency.<sup>48</sup> Nor is the character of a contract in this regard affected by a provision that, if the consignee takes notes for the purchase price not satisfactory to the consignor, he shall pay the amount in cash or by good notes, and that he shall indorse on the notes an agreement to pay the same if not paid at maturity;<sup>49</sup> nor by a provision that he will pay for unsold machines,<sup>50</sup> either in cash or good notes or notes approved by his principal,<sup>51</sup> especially where the contract contained by the consignee for the former's benefit, the consignee to make full settlement for all goods sold and to be allowed a certain commission as a cash discount.

Ames-Holden Co. v. Hatfield (1898) 29 Can. S. C. 95, holding that, as to the creditors of the consignee, the transaction created an agency, and not a sale, where the consignee was to sell at retail goods furnished by the consignor, make weekly remittances of the proceeds of the sales, and have a share of the net profits of the business.

58, 132 N. W. 572, holding that, as to the consignee's creditors, a provision that he should report all sales promptly, settle immediately for cash sales, indorse all contract and lien notes accepted for settlement, and make report of all stock on hand whenever requested to do so, cannot be given force and effect unless the contract is construed as one of consignment, and not of sale.

<sup>50</sup> Milburn Wagon Co. v. Edwards (1886) 7 Ky. L. Rep. 835, holding that title did not pass as to creditors under a contract in the form of an order for sale on commission of certain articles, the proceeds of sales to be remitted each month, although there was a provision for payment for all unsold goods remaining at the end of six months.

<sup>51</sup> Bayliss v. Davis (1877) 47 Iowa, 340, holding that a contract purporting to appoint one as agent for the sale of machines for a certain commission on each machine sold, the notes for the purchase price to be made payable to the principal, and providing that if any machines remain unsold at the end of the season the agent is to hold them over free of charge, but subject to the order of the principal, and if not ordered away the agent is to give the principal a satisfactory note therefor with interest, and providing further that the agent is to advance a certain amount in cash upon the purchase price of the machines, and give his note for the balance, and is to remit the proceeds of the sales after deducting the money advanced, and that there should be substituted for his notes, notes taken from the purchasers of machines, constitutes one of agency, and not of sale. The court said that the advancing of money by the agent and the giving of notes for the purchase price, while ordinarily indicating a sale, did not have that effect in the particular case, where the agent was to be repaid his advance and the notes he took for machines were to be substituted for his notes.

Williams Mower & Reaper Co. v. Raynor (1875) 38 Wis. 119, holding that, as between the parties, the contract is a consignment, and not a sale, and the consignee is therefore liable for a wrongful conversion if he uses the proceeds of the sale, where the contract does not purport to be a contract of sale, and it contains provisions restricting the agent as to the length of credit he may give in selling the articles, and a provision that the proceeds of sale shall be paid and delivered to the consignor, and that notes given for the purchase price shall contain a provision that the title to the article sold is to rea stipulation that the consignee acts thereunder in a fiduciary capacity.<sup>53</sup> Nor is the character of the contract affected by the fact that the maximum price for which the agent may sell the goods is discretionary with him, his only restriction in this regard being as to the minimum price,<sup>54</sup> or by an agreement to purchase at the termination of the contract all broken packages of goods then on hand.<sup>54</sup>

If a contract is actually one of agency, providing for the consignment of goods to be paid for at a fixed price out of the proceeds of a sale thereof, without any responsibility for the purchase price attaching to the consignee or agent, it will be construed to be an agency contract, and not a sale. In such case the title never vests in the agent by whom the sale is made; it passes directly from the consignor to the purchaser. Neither do the proceeds of the sale vest in the agent, for the title thereto passes directly to the principal.<sup>55</sup> But even under such circumstances a contract of this character does not create the relation of principal and agent in the sense that the agent is entitled to recover for services rendered in securing an order for goods which the principal refused to fill.<sup>56</sup>

But provisions requiring the consignee to remit the proceeds of sales are to be construed with other provisions in the contract, and when thus construed their effect, as determining the character of the contract, may be largely nullified by main in the consignor until the purchase price is paid in full, and the character of the sale is fixed by those provisions and is not affected by a provision that the consignee, at the option of the consignor, shall give his note for the purchase price of any unsold machines, and shall guarantee the payment of all notes taken for the purchase price of articles sold.

<sup>55</sup> Butler Bros. Shoe Co. v. United States Rubber Co. (1907) 84 C. C. A. 167, 156 Fed. 1, holding that a contract is a bailment for sale, and not one of sale, where it provides that the one party, upon orders of the other, would send the latter from its factory and warehouse goods of its manufacture, and that the consignee should make such advances thereon as the consignor might request, and would conduct the business and pay all the expense of selling the goods for a certain commission consisting of the difference between the purchase price and the selling price to the purchasers, and that the consignee should keep the proceeds of sales in a separate bank account, and remit therefrom to the consignor, and should guarantee accounts for goods sold to the extent of his profits. The consignee also agreed that upon the termination of the contract it would purchase and pay for all broken packages of goods then on hand.

<sup>56</sup> Federal Rubber Co. v. King (1913) 12 Ga. App. 261, 76 S. E. 1083, holding that, although the contract does not provide for the return of the unsold goods or expressly require the remittance of the proceeds of the sales, the provision in this regard being that at a certain time in each month the consignee shall pay in cash for all goods sold during the preceding thirty days, and shall be allowed a 5 per cent discount for cash, nevertheless, if the other provisions of the contract indicate the intent of the parties to create the relation of agency, and not that of seller and purchaser, it will be construed to be one of consignment.

*Burton v. <sup>56</sup> *Nagle v. other provisions inconsistent with the contract of agency or consignment, and consistent only with the contract of sale. For example, although there is a provision that the invoice price of the consigned articles shall be remitted at once by the agent upon the sale of the article, yet where the contract as a whole embodies provisions essential to a sale, and the consignee is required to give his notes for the purchase price, which is designated in the contract as an advance, and it is stipulated that upon paying the same he is to be released from all obligation as to the article covered by the note, the contract constitutes a sale, and not a consignment for sale.<sup>57</sup> And this is also true where the contract imposes upon the consignee the primary obligation to pay for the consigned goods, for in such case the provision that the proceeds of the sale shall belong to the consignor until full settlement by the consignee of his indebtedness is made will be construed to be a security clause merely.<sup>58</sup>

e. Provision making sale contingent upon resale by consignee.

The time in which the purchase money is to be paid,<sup>59</sup> even though upon the happening of some contingent event, such as a resale of the goods by the purchaser, does not affect the character of the transaction as a sale.<sup>60</sup> For a contract may be one of sale, and not of agency or consignment, although the passing of title is contingent upon the sale of the property by the consignee. For example, a contract constitutes a sale where the consignee agrees to pay a certain price for the consigned goods as he sells them, and there are no restrictions or limitations imposed upon his right to sell the goods or as to the selling price;<sup>61</sup> and this is true although

People use of Phoenix Nursery Co. v. Midkiff (1897) 71 Ill. Granite Roofing Co. v. Casler (Mich.) supra, holding that title passes to the purchaser and the loss of the articles by fire falls upon him, under a contract giving him full authority to handle the property of the other party thereto in a certain locality, it being recited that such property is sold to the purchaser to be paid for as sold, settlement to be made monthly for all goods sold.

Buffum v. Descher (1901) 1 Neb. (Unof.) 736, 96 N. W. 352, holding that where goods are left by a manufacturer with a retail dealer to be sold by the latter at such prices as he might fix, settlement the contract contains a clause giving the consignee the right to return unsold goods.<sup>62</sup>

And where on its face a contract is an undertaking to furnish certain articles at a fixed price, to be paid for when sold, without any provision for the return of any unsold articles, it is a conditional sale, and not an agency contract.<sup>63</sup>

Where a sale is conditional, contingent, or conditioned, upon the consignee's selling the goods, it, of course, does not become complete, and the liability of the consignee for the purchase price does not ordinarily become fixed, until he has sold the goods.<sup>64</sup> The contract, however, operates to create between the parties the relation of debtor and creditor, the title remaining in the consignor until a resale by the consignee.<sup>65</sup> And this is true as between the parties even though the proceeds of the sale are to be applied by the consignee upon a debt owing him by the consignor,<sup>66</sup> but as to the latter's creditors, title passes to the consignee.<sup>67</sup> It has been held that, where goods consigned for resale to be paid for when sold are destroyed by fire while in the possession and custody of the consignee, the loss falls upon him;<sup>68</sup> but where the articles were charged to the consignee when delivered and he was to account for them at the charged price if he sold them, and if he did not sell them they were to remain in his hands subject to the order of the consignor, it was held that the title did not pass to the consignee, and that the property was not covered by an insurance policy insuring the property of the consignee, including his stock in trade.<sup>69</sup>

Depew v. Keyser (1854) 3 Duer (N. Y.) 335, holding that an agreement to sell certain goods and account for the proceeds at a designated price constitutes a contract of sale, but the actual resale of the goods is a condition precedent to the liability of the consignee to the consignor as debtor.

Where the contract provides that the consigned goods are to be paid for when sold, and the consignee is given a certain length of time in which to sell them, it has been held that he becomes liable for the purchase price upon the expiration of such time without reference to whether or not he sells the goods.<sup>70</sup> It has been held that, even where the contract is one of agency and the title to the goods consigned remains in the principal until sold by the agent, nevertheless where by the terms of the contract the agent becomes responsible for the purchase price of the goods upon selling them, which is to be evidenced by his notes running to the principal upon the sale by the agent the proceeds belong to him and he becomes the debtor of his principal.<sup>71</sup>

In many of the cases referred to as holding that the title did not pass until the consignee had resold the goods, the holding was not inconsistent with other cases heretofore referred to which did not involve this specific point, but held that the transaction constitutes a sale, and not a contract of agency. Indeed, some of the cases specifically holding that title did not pass until a resale by the consignee also hold that the contract was one of sale, and not of agency. The question, while academic in some instances, becomes important in other cases; as, for example, where it involves the right to the proceeds of resales by the consignee. In such case, if the contract is held to be one of sale, obviously the consignee is entitled to the proceeds, and is not guilty of embezzlement if he uses them, for, upon the resale, he becomes merely the debtor of the consignor for the purchase price. But if such a contract is construed to be one of agency, and not of sale, of course the title never vests in the consignee, but passes directly to the purchaser, and the right to the proceeds of the sale immediately vests in the consignor, the consignee being a mere agency for the transfer. In this connection it is to be noted that, while a very similar contract to the ones construed by the foregoing cases was held to be one of agency, and not of sale,<sup>72</sup> yet this holding was made in denying to the consignor the right to hold the consignee for the purchase price of the consigned goods which were unsold. The actual holding, therefore, is not inconsistent with the cases already referred to.

The requirement that the consigned goods shall be sold within a designated time is also inconsistent with dominion over property conferred by an absolute sale thereof.<sup>73</sup> It has been asserted that limitations and conditions as to the sale

<sup>70</sup> Brayman v. Leslie (1880) 16 R. I. 521, 17 Atl. 922, holding that a transaction evidenced by a statement reciting that one party has bought of the other a certain stock of goods for a designated price, to be paid for as sold, and that he is to have a certain time to sell the same, constitutes a sale, and the purchaser is liable for the purchase price of the goods at the end of the designated time.

<sup>71</sup> Vermont Marble Co. v. Brow (1895) 100 Cal. 236, 50 Am. St. Rep. 37, 41 Pac. 1031, holding that, where a dealer receives monuments by consignment, to hold subject to the order of the consignor and to be sold as his property, the proceeds of the sales to be remitted if in cash, and if in notes, the notes to be remitted as collateral to his own notes for the goods sold, the transaction constitutes a sale upon the condition of a resale, and until then the consignee is under no obligation to pay for the articles consigned, and may be compelled to surrender to the consignor the articles at any time before they are sold.

Aetna Powder Co. v. Hildebrand (1894) 137 Ind. 462, 45 Am. St. Rep. 194, 37 N. E. 136, holding that the principal cannot follow the proceeds of sales made by his so-called agent, or claim the goods as an undisclosed principal, under a contract purporting to be one of agency, but making the agent responsible for the purchase price when the goods are sold.

E. 1117, holding that, as between the parties, the contract is one of sale, and not of agency, although it purports to create an agency and provides for the consignment of property to the alleged agent to be sold at retail and settled for as sold, except that goods subsequently ordered are to be settled for monthly, where it contains no provision that the agent shall transmit the proceeds of sales to the principal or receive any commission for making sales, or any stipulation as to price or terms for resales.

<sup>72</sup> Federal Chemical Co. v. Green (1906) 30 Ky. L. Rep. 223, 97 S. W. 803, holding that, where goods are delivered for sale on consignment with a provision that those sold shall be settled for at a certain time, the balance to be carried over to another season, the transaction constitutes an agency to sell, and not an absolute sale, and the consignee cannot be held for the purchase price of the unsold goods.

at retail of the product of a manufacturer are inconsistent with the dominion conferred by an actual sale.<sup>74</sup> But conditions and provisions restricting the sale by retail of consigned goods may sometimes be explained on the theory that the manufacturer, in giving an exclusive agency for the sale of his goods, was desirous of exercising some control over the price at which they were to be sold and the extent to which they were to be advertised, etc. Under such circumstances, of course, such provisions do not have the effect of changing a contract of sale into one of consignment or agency.<sup>75</sup>

In cases holding that a contract for the sale of an article at a stated price to be paid when sold was one of sale, and not of agency, the terms of the contract indicated that the parties intended the consignee should become liable for the purchase price at and from the time of the resale. Upon the happening of this event the obligation to pay was to become absolute without reference to the dealings between the consignee and the purchaser, except the mere fact of the sale. Such contracts are not to be confused with contracts by which goods are consigned for sale, the proceeds to be delivered to the consignor and accounted for by the consignee less the latter's commission. Contracts of this character are bailment or consignment contracts, and not contracts of sale.<sup>76</sup> In such cases, of course, the controlling question is whether the contract provides for a consignment of the goods to be settled for at a fixed price out of the proceeds of the goods when sold, or whether the consignee becomes liable as principal debtor for the goods when sold.<sup>77</sup> For, although the seller cannot, as against a bona fide purchaser, retain title to goods delivered to a retail dealer for resale, yet he may place goods in the hands of a general commission merchant or factor to be sold on his account without making the property thus delivered subject to levy by creditors of the agent.<sup>78</sup>

h. Provision for return of unsold goods.

Where the leading feature of a contract of this character is a reservation by the consignor of the right to have the unsold articles returned, the stipulation is inconsistent with the absolute sale of the property, and indicates an intent to retain the title in the consignor.<sup>80</sup> And it has been declared that

Franklin v. Stoughton Wagon Co. (1909) 94 C. C. A. 269, 168 Fed. 867, holding that, where the consignor of goods retains full control of the disposition to be made of them, in that he reserves the power to have the goods returned to him or shipped else-one of the fundamental rights of the consignor of goods for sale on commission is the right to have the goods returned to him upon demand before sale, subject, of course, to the payment of advances and other expenses of the consignee, and where the provisions of the contract are such as to defeat or destroy this right, the transaction is not a consignment for sale.<sup>81</sup> So, a stipulation that the consigned goods are at all times subject to the order of the consignor until they are sold, and if any remain unsold at a designated time they are to be returned to him, indicates the contract to be a bailment for sale, and not a sale.<sup>82</sup> But the mere fact that a contract entitles the purchaser to return where, an essential element of a contract of sale is lacking; hence, the contract will be construed to be one of agency, and not of sale, although the consignee is to guarantee the payment of all notes executed by the purchasers of the consigned goods, and agrees that at a certain time, if so required by the consignor, he will purchase all unsold goods and give in settlement therefor his notes.

the unsold portions of goods received thereunder does not convert it from a contract of sale into one of agency.<sup>83</sup>

4. Reservation of title in consignor.

In the absence of a statutory provision requiring that conditional sales be recorded to be valid, a reservation of title in the seller is valid to the extent of securing him while the goods are in the hands of the buyer,<sup>84</sup> and in some cases in the hands of subsequent purchasers from the buyer. The provision, however, ordinarily indicates a sale of the property, although it is in form an agency contract and purports to appoint the purchaser the consignor's agent to sell the consigned goods,<sup>85</sup> for a provision of this character is not essential if the contract is one of consignment or agency, since the title remains in the principal as a matter of course.<sup>86</sup> It is

Hessig-Ellis Drug Co. v. Sly (1910) 83 Kan. 60, 109 Pac. 770, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 551, holding that a contract by a foreign corporation for the sale of its product to a dealer in a certain community, including an agreement not to make sales to others in that locality and an agreement to take back unsold goods, is a contract of sale, and not an agency, and hence the act of the purchaser in selling the goods within the state does not constitute doing business therein by the corporation.

William Frantz & Co. v. Fink (1910) 125 La. 1013, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 539, 52 So. 131, holding that, where goods are delivered to a retail dealer under an agreement that he can retain them and pay a certain price, or return them, it constitutes a sale and title passes upon delivery.

Marsh v. Wickham (1817) 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 167, holding that a contract is one of sale, and not a consignment for sale, where it fixes the price to be paid for goods received, provides for a certain deduction, and permits the return on final settlement of any unsold goods.

Capuano v. Italian Importing Co. (1915) 89 Misc. 449, 151 N. Y. Supp. 994, holding that, as between the parties, a mere agreement by the seller of goods to take back any unsold goods, although a part of the contract of sale, does not prevent the title from passing to the purchaser.

Peek v. Heim (1889) 127 Pa. 500, 14 Am. St. Rep. 865, 17 Atl. 984, holding a contract to be a sale, and not a consignment, although purporting to be the latter, where the title is reserved by the consignor and the consignee agrees to pay a certain price for the article within a designated time, or return it.

W. 1086, holding that a contract purporting to appoint one party thereto the agent of the other to sell a stock of goods at retail, and from the proceeds pay the purchase price by monthly instalments, and further providing that the title must remain in the seller until the purchase price is paid, is a contract of conditional sale, and not of agency. To the same effect are Richardson Drug Co. v. Oberfelder (1899) 58 Neb. 822, 80 N. W. 50, and Richardson Drug Co. v. Teasdale (1897) 52 Neb. 698, 72 N. W. 1028.

<sup>86</sup> Re Wells (1905) 140 Fed. 752, holding that conditions attached to contracts of this character, that the title shall not pass until the goods are paid for, amount to nothing as a restriction upon the character of the contract. Such a stipulation, however, is unnecessary if the transaction is in reality a bailment.

Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1908) 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803, holding that, where a contract casts upon the consignee all the responsibilities of an owner, and he is not given the right to return the unsold goods, the retention of the title for security for the purchase price merely makes the contract one of conditional sale; the consignee is still the general owner and is responsible as such.

Mark v. Story (1889) 57 Conn. 407, 18 Atl. 707, holding that, where a wholesaler left liquor with a retail dealer under an agreement that the title should remain in the former until the goods were paid for, with permission to sell to customers and account for the quantity sold at an agreed price, the transaction constituted an absolute sale. To the same effect, see Lewis v. McCabe (1881) 49 Conn. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 217.

Forrest v. Nelson (1885) 108 Pa. 481, holding that, as to the creditors of the consignee, a contract is one of sale, and not a bailment, where it recites that the one party has agreed to sell to the other party certain articles at a designated price and at designated times of payment, and contains a provision reserving title in the consignor until such payment is made, and a provision for the return of the articles in event of a default by the consignee.

therefore useful only in contracts of sale, although the fact that a consignment contract contains a clause of this kind does not operate to make it a contract of sale. And a provision authorizing the seller or alleged principal to take possession of the goods and deliver them to the purchasers, or dispose of them and apply the proceeds upon his account against the buyer or alleged agent, does not prevent the contract from being a sale of the goods, since it is in the nature of an insecurity clause.<sup>87</sup>

Where the contract contains apt words both of sale and of agency, and its character therefore is ambiguous in this regard, reference may properly be had to the declarations, acts, and conduct of the parties, including their previous course of dealing, to aid in the construction of the contract. Indeed, the course of dealing between the parties for a considerable period of time is often the most satisfactory mode of indicating their intention and the character of the relation existing between them.<sup>88</sup> For example, where the parties to such a contract have treated it as a consignment for sale, and not an absolute sale, it will be so construed.<sup>89</sup> But it has been held that a contract which purports to be one of consignment, but which in legal effect is a sale, and which contains no latent ambiguity, does not authorize the receipt of extrinsic evidence of the conduct of the parties to show the construction they placed upon it.<sup>90</sup>

In line with the rule admitting extrinsic evidence to show the character of the contract, it has been held that as between the parties, the character of such a contract may be determined by a written acknowledgment by the consignee that he is the agent of the consignor, and holds the consigned goods as such.<sup>90a</sup> A printed billhead, however, can have little or no influence in changing the clear and explicit language of letters constituting a contract, and it in no way controls, modifies, or alters the terms of the contract.<sup>91</sup> And the term "invoice" as used in a contract of this character, to the effect that the property is invoiced at a certain price, does not conclusively indicate an absolute sale, since it may as properly be employed in a contract of bailment.<sup>92</sup> Nor does the fact that the consigned goods were invoiced at a stated price in and of itself make the transaction a sale unless the terms of the consignment are such as to make the consignee the purchaser and principal debtor when the goods are sold.<sup>93</sup> Where, however, goods are ordered by a merchant and shipped Rolker v. Great Western Ins. Co. (1866) 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 76, holding that, as used in a commercial sense, to consign property to another implies trust for sale, and does not indicate the passing of title to the consignee, and this is true although an invoice accompanies the consigned goods.

Pam v. Vilmar (1876) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 235, holding that merely stating in the invoice of a shipment the value of the goods shipped does not indicate an absolute sale, for even to a consignee or agent the invoice may properly state the price or value of the article.

by a wholesaler who sends an ordinary merchant's bill of sale of the parcels, the presumption is that the sale is absolute, and not a consignment.<sup>94</sup>

It has been held that the fact that goods were billed to a consignee as if sold to him, and that a petition to recover the value thereof was filed in a suit against him, does not seriously affect the character of the transaction.<sup>95</sup> And the fact that the invoice and other instruments attached to a shipping declaration indicated that a consignment of goods was an absolute sale will not control where the correspondence between the parties and their method of settlement clearly indicate that the transaction was in fact a consignment for sale.<sup>96</sup> As heretofore pointed out, however, there is no magic in the words "consignment" or "agency" which can change the real character of a transaction from a sale to a consignment or agency contract.<sup>97</sup> And where the form of the agreement is that of a consignment for sale, but the real purpose of this form was to cover up a sale and preserve a lien for the benefit of the consignor, it will be held to be a sale.<sup>98</sup>

So, where it is apparent that there is no purpose to create an agency, except a mere executory agreement to create a so-called agency to transform the relationship of debtor into a relationship of agency in case of default in payment of the debt owing for goods sold, the contract does not create the relation of principal and agent, nor, as against creditors in bankruptcy proceedings, can the ownership of the fund be transferred in this manner to the seller for this purpose.<sup>99</sup>

V. Delivery of product to be manufactured and sold.

In harmony with the rule that, where the title to consigned property passes absolutely or contingently to the consignee, imposing upon him an obligation to pay the purchase price, the transaction constitutes a sale, it is held that a consignment contract does not constitute a sale where it amounts merely to delivery of some product to be manufactured and sold for a certain compensation or a share in the proceeds.<sup>100</sup> For in such case there is nothing in the transaction indicating an intention to pass title either to the raw or the finished product, and the manufacturer assumes no obli-

VI. Del credere agency.

If the factor undertakes to guarantee the payment of debts arising from the sale by him of articles for his principal, he is construed to sell on a del credere commission, and hence the contract to guarantee the payment of notes he takes for the purchase price of articles he sells is not inconsistent with the theory of agency.<sup>101</sup>

A provision in a contract of this character which requires the consignee to guarantee the collection of all notes taken for articles he sells is merely a del credere agreement, and does not affect the title to the property to which it relates or the fiduciary relations of the parties.<sup>102</sup>

E. 595, holding that a delivery of milk to a cheese factory to be manufactured into butter and cheese and sold for a certain compensation constitutes a bailment, and not a sale, and the bailee is not responsible for the loss of the property by fire on the theory that the title had passed to him.

And see Schenck v. Saunders (1859) 13 Gray (Mass.) 37, holding that title did not pass under a contract to deliver leather to be manufactured into shoes, the shoes to be sold by the owner of the leather, and the manufacturer to receive as his compensation the proceeds of the sales less a stipulated commission and the cost of the leather.

Cas. 675, holding that, where goods are consigned for sale to net the consignor a certain price, the consignee to have all he received above such price, and to guarantee the payment of the purchase price of all sales made, the transaction creates a del credere agency.

Compare with Columbia Carriage Co. v. Hatch (1898) 19 Tex. Civ. App. 120, 47 S. W. 288, holding that a contract was one of sale, and not of agency, and hence came within the provision of the statute against monopolies and conspiracies in restraint of trade, where it provided that the one party was to handle exclusively in a certain territory the manufactured products of the other party, all goods sold to be settled for by purchasers' notes guaranteed by the consignee.

Sale — to retailer — condition — retention of title.

1. The retention by a wholesaler of dry goods of title to the goods and their proceeds in a sales contract under which the goods pass to a retailer for resale is effective against a chattel mortgage executed by the retailer to a trustee for creditors.

For other cases, see Sales, I. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Contract — fraud — fine type — failure to inform.

2. A retention of title to dry goods sold by a wholesaler to a retailer cannot be declared fraudulent because the provision therefor was in fine print and the attention of the purchaser was not called to it, if it was in the same type as the rest of the contract, of which there was very little excepting such reservation, while the parties had previously had similar dealings with each other.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought here by defendant, after judgment for plaintiff, upon a case made, in an action of replevin. The case was tried by the court without a jury. The facts, being stipulated, were adopted by the court, and made a part of the finding. The material facts in the case are as follows:

For some time prior to April 10, 1912, Joseph D. Van Sickle had been engaged in the general merchandise business at Carson City, Michigan, and on said date plaintiff's agent called upon said Van Sickle and took an order for goods in the usual way, on blanks furnished by plaintiff, a copy of which order appears in the record. The attention of Van Sickle, who signed the order, was not called to any of the agreements printed on said order blank, and he did not know that the fine print at the bottom of the order blank contained an agreement whereby "the title to, property in, and right of possession of said goods should be and remain in said first party until sold, and that upon sale thereof the proceeds received therefor, whether notes, accounts, or moneys, should be and remain the property of said first party until said goods are fully paid for in cash." Nor was said Van Sickle ever instructed or requested to keep a separate account of sales made from said goods, or of the cash, notes, or accounts received therefor. The goods mentioned in said order were shipped by plaintiff and received by Van Sickle some time in the month of September, 1912, and were billed to him by plaintiff at $640.64. Said Van Sickle had previously purchased merchandise of the same or similar kind and quality from the plaintiff, parts of which remained in his stock at the time the goods in the above-mentioned order were received and placed in stock.

Upon receipt of the goods in question, Van Sickle placed the same in his store, together with his stock previously purchased from plaintiff, as well as with other goods comprising his general stock of merchandise. Sales were made by Van Sickle from his general stock of merchandise, including goods received from plaintiff, in the usual course of trade, some goods being sold for cash; others were sold on credit and were charged in personal accounts, on which the customers paid on account from time to time, without reference to any particular item, and some merchandise was paid for by accepting in exchange butter and eggs, which in turn were sold for cash or on credit. No attempt was ever made by Van Sickle to separate the accounts or money received from the sale of goods ordered from plaintiff from money or accounts received from the sale of goods bought of other merchants or manufacturers, and the same was mingled together at all times and used by Van Sickle as a single fund.

On April 12, 1913, said Van Sickle, being financially embarrassed, gave defendant a trustee chattel mortgage upon all his merchandise and fixtures, including the goods ordered from plaintiff, to secure all his creditors alike, including plaintiff. Said Van Sickle, previous to April 12, 1913, had sold $486.06 worth of the goods ordered from the plaintiff on April 10, 1912, having on hand $154.58 worth of said goods. He also had on hand $73.33 worth of similar goods bought from plaintiff previous to April 10, 1912. Van Sickle had paid plaintiff in full for all goods purchased previous to April 10, 1912, but had paid only $100 on the purchase price of the goods ordered April 10, 1912, leaving a balance of $540.64 due plaintiff on the goods so ordered. After accepting the trust under the mortgage and taking possession of the stock, defendant notified the various creditors of Van Sickle of the giving of the mortgage, and requested statements of their accounts in order that he might verify the same and make distribution of the proceeds of the property to be sold under the mortgage. He received a statement from plaintiff showing $555.63, including freight and interest, amounting to $14.99, due it from Van Sickle, and made one payment of 30 per cent to all creditors, including plaintiff. The plaintiff then caused an investigation to be made, and upon learning that there were certain of said goods on hand, paid back a proportionate amount of the 30 per cent received, and demanded the goods on hand from the trustee, claiming title under and by virtue of the clause in fine print at the bottom of the order, and, being refused possession by the defendant, acting as trustee under said mortgage, plaintiff brought replevin for said goods. It was agreed that the value of the goods replevied was $154.56, and in case of judgment for defendant, return of the goods was waived, and a judgment in said sum was to be entered; and in case of judgment for plaintiff, then the damages L.R.A.1917B.

were to be assessed at 6 cents, with costs to be taxed.

Under the heading of "Guaranty," the pertinent clause in said order, which was just above the signature of said Van Sickle, was as follows: "It is agreed by and between the said Mishawaka Woolen Manufacturing Company, party of the first part, and the undersigned orderer of the foregoing goods, party of the second part, that the title to, property in, and right of possession to said goods, and to all other goods ordered by said second party of said first party within one year from the date hereof, shall remain in said first party until sold by said second party, and that upon sale thereof the proceeds received therefor, whether notes, accounts, or moneys, shall be and remain the property of said first party until the said goods are fully paid for in cash; that if payment for the same shall not be made when due, or if at any time before the same shall be fully paid for, said second party shall become insolvent, or shall, in the opinion of said first party, be in danger of insolvency, or if said first party shall, for any reason whatever, deem itself in danger of losing the price of said goods, then the said first party may reclaim, and take possession of so much of the said goods as shall remain unsold in the ordinary course of retail business, and may also take possession of any proceeds of sale of any such goods; that said second party shall not sell, ship, or reship, or in any manner directly or indirectly supply any retail or wholesale dealer with any such goods, nor dispose of them in any manner except in the ordinary course of business at retail sale, except with the express consent and approval of said first party previously obtained; that 'punched' goods are ordered subject to said first party's having them in stock; and that it does not guarantee quality or delivery. The party of the first part will not be responsible for delays by reason of strikes, fires, accidents, or other causes beyond its control."

Counsel for defendant filed certain requests for special findings of law. The conclusions of law by the trial court were as follows:

"(1) That Joseph D. Van Sickle, having signed the order, Exhibit A, he and his mortgagee are both bound thereby, even though he did not read the agreement in fine print above his signature; and the defendant's fourth and fifth requests are therefore refused.

"(2) That the delivery of all the goods by the plaintiff to Joseph D. Van Sickle under the contract order set out in the agreed statement of facts constituted a valid conditional sale.

"(3) That under the agreed statement of facts said Joseph D. Van Sickle was bound by the terms of the agreement that he entered into with the plaintiff, whether or not he knew the contents of the agreement he signed.

"(4) That the agreement signed by the said Joseph D. Van Sickle and the plaintiff clearly shows that the meaning of the agreement was that the title to the goods sold by the plaintiff to said Joseph D. Van Sickle under the contract was to remain in the plaintiff until the goods were sold by the said Joseph D. Van Sickle in the ordinary course of retail trade.

"(5) That the position of the clause retaining title in the plaintiff of the goods unsold and the type in which such clause is printed are sufficient to bind said Joseph D. Van Sickle to the terms of the agreement.

"(6) That the rights of the defendant under the trust mortgage are exactly the same as were the rights of Joseph D. Van Sickle in regard to the goods covered by the conditional sale contract and that were not sold in the ordinary course of retail trade.

"(7) The vital question of law in this case seems to be whether or not an absolute sale is made and title passes to the purchaser, where the property is sold and delivered to the buyer for the purpose of resale. . . . Without comment upon the cases which hold that it is against public policy to validate a contract which seeks to withhold title, and at the same time gives to a vendee the right to make immediate resale in his own name, it is sufficient to say that the supreme court of our state has decided adversely to the defendant's first, second, and third requests, and those requests are therefore refused.

"(8) I find, under the stipulated facts and the decisions of the supreme court of the state of Michigan, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in its favor of 6 cents damages, and costs to be taxed."

Proposed amendments were refused, and exceptions duly taken.

By appropriate assignments of error the following questions are presented by appellant:

(1) Can the vendor of merchandise sold expressly for resale retain title thereto, as against the creditors or subsequent purchasers, or encumbrances from the conditional vendee?

(2) Is the signer, or his legal representative, bound by the terms of a contract contained in fine print, which he did not read, under the circumstances here appearing?

1. In presenting the first question, counsel for appellant concede that personal property may be sold or contracted to a purchaser, to be by him retained and used for his pleasure or business, and that such contracts are valid and binding upon the creditors of, or purchasers from, the conditional vendee, and they call attention to nearly a score of such cases.

They claim, however, that it is equally well settled, by the great weight of authority throughout the United States, that personal property sold or delivered with the express understanding that the same is to be resold is an exception to the general rule applicable to conditional sales, and that such a sale or delivery of property is inconsistent with the continued ownership of the vendor, and is void as to creditors of or subsequent purchasers from said vendee. In support of this proposition counsel cite the dissenting opinion of Justice Grant in Excelsior Iron Works v. Lee, 123 Mich. 499, 82 N. W. 207; Ludden v. Hazen, 31 Barb. 650; Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Westveer, 112 C. C. A. 109, 191 Fed. 465, and a large number of cases from other states; also John Deere Plow Co. v. Mowry, 137 C. C. A. 539, 222 Fed. 1.

In reply, counsel for plaintiff claim that upon this proposition the courts of this country may be divided into four classes:

(1) Those holding contracts of conditional sale void as against public policy, whether filed or recorded or not. Examples of such courts are those of Kentucky and Tennessee.

(2) Those holding such contracts valid between the parties and those having notice thereof, when they relate to specific articles, such as a horse, piano, etc., but void, as against public policy, when they relate to sales of merchandise intended for resale at retail, and that examples of such courts are those of New York, Indiana, Mississippi, and Texas.

(3) Those holding such contracts valid between the parties and those having notice thereof, no matter whether or not they relate to specific articles or to merchandise intended for resale, but invalid as against innocent purchasers, mortgagees, etc., unless filed or recorded in the proper clerk's office; and that examples of such courts are those of Ohio, Minnesota, North Dakota, and Wisconsin.

(4) Those holding such contracts valid, whether they relate to specific articles or to stocks of merchandise intended for resale, not only between the parties and those having notice thereof, but also as between the conditional vendor and an innocent purchaser or mortgagee of the vendee, or between the vendor and the attachment or judgment creditors of the vendee, or as between the vendor and the assignee in insolvency proceedings or trustee in bankruptcy of the vendee, irrespective of whether or not such contracts are filed or recorded; that examples of such courts are those of Michigan, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, and Arkansas; and that no court has gone further to sustain contracts of conditional sale than has this court, and that in no case has this court held such contracts void or against public policy, whether they related to the sale of merchandise intended for resale or only to a specific article intended for use by the vendee.

In support of this claim plaintiff's counsel cites the following cases: F. J. Dewes Brewery Co. v. Merritt, 82 Mich. 198, 9 L.R.A. 270, 46 N. W. 379; Pratt v. Burhans, 84 Mich. 487, 22 Am. W. 572; and many of our earlier cases. Many cases are also cited from other states.

We cannot here undertake to analyze all of the cases cited by counsel. We shall not refer to the many cases cited relating to the sale of personal property which has been attached as fixtures to the realty, as we are not dealing with that question. We shall refer to a few only of our own cases.

In F. J. Dewes Brewery Co. v. Merritt, supra, the plaintiff shipped beer to Lentz Brothers under the following contract:

Big Rapids, Mich., Dec. 18, 1888.

It is hereby agreed by and between the F. J. Dewes Brewing Company, of Chicago, Illinois, and Lentz Brothers, of the city of Big Rapids, Michigan: That the F. J. Dewes Brewing Company agree to ship to Lentz Brothers all beer ordered by them at the following price, $5.75 per barrel, f. o. b., at Big Rapids, and that the right, title, and interest of said beer is to remain and rest in the F. J. Dewes Brewing Company until sold; and we, the said Lentz Brothers, agree to take the said beer, and pay for the same, on above conditions.

Signed by the parties.

The brewing company, under the above contract, sent to Lentz Brothers two carloads of beer, which were received by them at Big Rapids. After they had sold about one and one-half carloads, the remainder was levied upon by the defendant, as sheriff of Mecosta county, and was taken away by him upon an execution in his hands, issued L.R.A.1917B.

upon a valid judgment in favor of a creditor of one of the members of the firm of Lentz Brothers. The circuit judge instructed the jury that, under the terms of the agreement, the absolute title to the beer passed at once to Lentz Brothers and was subject to levy and sale under the execution, and a judgment in replevin was entered for the defendant. In reviewing that judgment this court said:

"Now, the contract was one which it was competent for the parties to make, unless it was void as being against public policy. The brewery company had a right to say: 'We will fill your order for beer, which you may sell as you choose, but the title shall remain in us until you do sell, and then the title will pass to the purchaser; in which case we will trust to your personal responsibility to pay us, at the rate of $5.75 a barrel.' The effect of such contract was that the property not sold remained the property of the company, and the firm owed them for all they had sold. . . . This court has gone very far in sustaining conditional sales, and has never declared them void, or different from what the parties have intended by their agreement [citing cases].

"The authorities cited above show the principles upon which this court has proceeded in upholding such contracts, and it is unnecessary to restate them here or to review the decisions of other courts holding a different view."

In Pratt v. Burhans, 84 Mich. 487, 22 Am. St. Rep. 703, 47 N. W. 1064, plaintiffs entered into a contract with the Owosso Cigar Company by which they agreed to send and deliver to it a quantity of cigars, the title thereto to be retained in plaintiffs until paid for or sold, and, when sold, the accounts to belong to them. The defendant, Burhans, had indorsed for the Owosso Cigar Company. Plaintiffs shipped goods to the cigar company, and shortly after it turned over all its stock, including the cigars shipped by plaintiffs, to the defendant, and gave him a bill of sale thereof, which the latter claimed was a bona fide purchase, in consideration of his indorsement. Defendant took possession of the goods. After demand and refusal plaintiffs brought replevin. In this court it was held that the sole issue for the jury was whether plaintiffs and the Owosso Cigar Company made a contract by which the title of the goods was to remain in the plaintiffs until they were paid for or sold in due course of trade. Justice Grant said: "The defendant did not buy them in the due course of trade; and therefore, if such a contract was made, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Such a contract is valid under the repeated decisions of this court, and we are not concerned with the decisions of other courts upon the subject. Those who purchased in the usual course of trade would take a good title. Those who did not purchase in the usual course of trade could not rely upon the bare possession of their vendor as conclusive evidence of title."

Counsel for defendant claim that these two cases were really overruled by this court in People v. Newman, 99 Mich. 148, 57 N. W. 1073. We do not so understand it. The Newman Case did not involve the question of conditional sale. There the respondent was charged with selling beer at wholesale without having filed the bond and paid the tax required by law. His contention was that he was acting as agent of a brewing company, and he relied upon a contract, which appears in the opinion. The trial court instructed the jury that, under the terms of the contract there was practically a sale of the beer to the respondent, and that he was not an agent, but a purchaser. This court affirmed the conviction. In our opinion, the only cases in this court which might be claimed to be authorities against the application of the principle of conditional sale, as heretofore stated, are Choate v. Stevens, 116 Mich. 28, 43 L.R.A. 277, 74 N. W. 289; Van Den Bosch v. Bouwman, 138 Mich. 624, 110 Am. St. Rep. 336, 101 N. W. 832; and Coeling v. Green, 163 Mich. 27, 127 N. W. 792. A careful examination of these cases discloses the fact that they fully recognize the principle enunciated by this court in the cases above quoted from. This becomes more evident by the fact that we have in the subsequent cases of American Harrow Co. v. Deyo, 134 Mich. 639, 96 N. W. 1055; Bunday v. Columbus Mach. Co. 143 Mich. 10, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 475, 106 N. W. 397, and Worden Grocer Co. v. Blanding, 161 Mich. 254, 126 N. W. 212, 20 Ann. Cas. 1332, carefully distinguished the Choate and Van Den Bosch Cases from the former cases, and reaffirmed the principle established in the earlier cases. As we said in the recent case of Atkinson v. Japink, 186 Mich. 335, 152 N. W. 1079, whether a sale of personal property is absolute or conditional depends upon the contract of the parties. The distinction attempted to be made by counsel for appellant was also attempted in Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Westveer, 112 C. C. A. 109, 191 Fed. 465, in the circuit court of appeals,—a case arising under the law of Michigan. In that case Judge Warrington said: "It is argued that decisions passing upon contracts in terms reserving title in articles delivered for personal use of the original taker, like machinery, pianos, and sewing machines, are distinguished from decisions under similar contracts relating to articles delivered for purposes of resale. We do not discover that the supreme court of Michigan has made such a distinction, and it is difficult to see any sufficient reason for its existence. Both classes of articles are delivered into the possession and control of the first taker, without notice to any other person of any title or interest retained in them. They are alike chattels, which, in such instances, connote ownership and the right of sale in their possessor. Anyone having dealings in respect to them with a person in possession and control, without notice and for a present valuable consideration, ought to secure the same rights with regard to the one class as the other."

It is true that in that case the court held that it was within the principles of Choate v. Stevens and Van Den Bosch v. Bouwman, supra. The contract in that case differed from the contract in the instant case, in that there was nothing in the agreement in that case which purported to give title to the vendor in any of the proceeds of sale, whether received in the form of notes, accounts, or cash. That fact is pointed out by the court. In that respect the form of contract was changed before it was signed by Van Sickle. It is true that in John Deere Plow Co. v. Mowry, 137 C. C. A. 539, 222 Fed. 1, Judge Denison said: "It is true that in the Mishawaka Case there was special reliance on the fact that the contract did not attempt to preserve to the vendor a substituted title to the proceeds when the goods were sold, and that in the present case this reservation is, in terms, made; but we are not satisfied, taking all the conditions together, to treat this as a controlling distinction."

After a careful review of our own decisions, we are of the opinion that the position of the plaintiff is the correct one, and that the trial court reached the correct conclusion upon the subject. The views of the defendant cannot prevail without overruling the repeated decisions of this court which have become fundamental in business transactions in this state. The legislature can readily change the rule by requiring the recording of such contracts, as in the case of chattel mortgages.

2. It is claimed that the reservation of title was fraudulent because the clause was in fine print, and the attention of the purchaser was not called to it. A facsimile of the contract is attached to the record. An inspection shows that the clause complained of was in the same sized type as the remainder of the contract. It was in the body of the instrument, just above Van Sickle's signature. There is very little other printed matter in the contract. He should have read it, and if he did not do so, he alone is to blame. In the stipulation of facts it is stated that "plaintiff's agent called upon said Joseph D. Van Sickle and took an order for goods in the usual way, on blanks furnished by plaintiff."

There was no attempt on the part of plaintiff's agent to conceal this clause from Van Sickle. The latter had purchased goods in previous years of the plaintiff. It is fair to presume that the previous orders had been upon similar blanks. Weight must always be given to the fact of the execution of a contract; and the presumption which exists in favor of written instruments cannot be overcome, except upon evidence from which an inference of duress, deception, misrepresentation, substitution, or artifice is clearly deducible. Such evidence is wanting here. Sullivan v. Ross, 98 Mich. 570, 57 N. ### Annotation—Validity of conditional-sale contracts as affected by express or implied permission to purchaser to sell in the ordinary course of business.

It is not intended in this note to consider the rights of the parties as affected by recording laws; for the cases on this question, see note in 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 554. As to the right of the vendor in a conditional sale, as affected by the bankruptcy of the purchaser, and as to the duty of a purchaser of property from the conditional vendee with the right to sell to see that the latter's vendor is paid, see note in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 585.

As to the construction of contracts containing provisions peculiar to consignment, agency, or sales contracts, see note appended to D. M. Ferry & Co. v. Hall, ante, 626; and generally as to the right of a person leaving his chattels in another's possession to claim title against the latter's vendees or creditors, see note appended to Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 760.

As between the parties.

As suggested by the title, this note is limited to the question of the construction of conditional-sale contracts as affected by express or implied permission to sell in the ordinary course of business.

Aside from one or two jurisdictions, the validity of contracts of conditional sale by which the seller reserves title to the property until the purchase price is paid is recognized and enforced, except that in some jurisdictions these contracts are required to be recorded in order to be valid against subsequent purchasers or creditors. The essential thing in a contract of conditional sale is the reservation of title in the seller; and the present question is as to the effect on such a contract of express or implied authority to the buyer to resell the property in the ordinary course of his business. It has been urged, and even held, by some courts, that such authority is inconsistent with the essentials of a conditional sale, and that the effect is to make the sale an absolute one with title absolutely vesting in the buyer; and it has also been held that such authority was fraudulent as to subsequent purchasers and creditors of the purchaser, rendering the reservation of title void as to them. The courts are not in harmony on this question, however, and the weight of authority and certainly the better reasoning supports the view that authority to the purchaser to sell property purchased by conditional sale does not in any way affect the character of the contract, and in and of itself furnishes no proof of fraud on the part of the parties thereto. The owner of property, if he sells it, has the right to sell it upon such conditions as the purchaser may agree to; and it is lawful for the purchaser to agree that the title shall remain in the seller until the latter has been paid for the property. Such contracts are very common, and, as a rule, are of great benefit to the public at large, for worthy people without financial credit are enabled in this way to secure property necessary to their business, comfort, and convenience, and pay for the same in convenient instalments. As heretofore stated, the legality of these contracts is beyond question. There is no reason why the contract should become unlawful or fraudulent merely because express or implied authority is given the purchaser to resell it in the ordinary course of his business, in view of the fact that, as shown in a note appended to D. M. Ferry & Co. v. Hall, ante, 626, it is entirely lawful to contract for the consignment of goods by one party to the other, to be sold by the latter as agent for the former. And although the goods are placed in the possession of the agent without anything appearing to indicate his lack of ownership, nevertheless his creditors or subsequent purchasers, with or without notice, paying a valuable consideration, can obtain no right to such goods as against the principal and owner. And in harmony with this view it has been held that when the seller of property by conditional sale expressly or impliedly authorizes the purchaser to resell the property in the ordinary course of his business, he does not thereby indicate any intention of vesting the purchaser with the title to the property; the reservation-of-title clause clearly discloses his intention to retain title, and it is valid as between the parties.<sup>1</sup>

As to subsequent purchasers.

The authority to sell merely indicates and evidences the intention of the seller to permit the conditional purchaser to resell the property as the agent of the seller. Upon the sale being made, the title passes directly from the original seller to the subpurchaser, and of course the latter obtains a good title to the property. It is the title of the original owner, and having authorized the sale, the latter is estopped to deny the subpurchaser's title, unless he can show that the latter did not purchase in accordance with the authority to sell.<sup>2</sup> For example, that he paid the purchase price by giving the conditional purchaser credit, or that he took the property in payment of an obligation owing him by the conditional purchaser.<sup>3</sup>

The courts are not agreed as to the rights of subsequent purchasers of a stock of goods in bulk, and which embrace goods sold by conditional sale. The view taken by the apparent weight of authority is that the power to sell given to a retail dealer is limited to sales by him in the ordinary course of business, and does not extend to sales of an entire stock in bulk; hence, such sales are not effective to cut off the title of the original owner, and he is not estopped to assert his title.<sup>4</sup> It has been held, however, that a reservation-of-title clause is not valid as to subsequent purchasers of the stock in bulk, which included the goods purchased on conditional sale, where the permission to sell was unrestricted.<sup>5</sup> And it has also been held that where a subpurchaser bought without actual or constructive notice of the reservation-of-title clause, he obtained a valid title as against the original seller.<sup>6</sup> But it has been held that the fact that goods were sold for the purpose of enabling the purchaser to place them in a certain building for another did not estop the original owner from asserting title thereto under his reservation clause, as against another purchaser of the goods for a different purpose.<sup>7</sup>

But see Columbus Buggy Co. v. Turley (1895) 73 Miss. 529, 32 L.R.A. 260, 55 Am. St. Rep. 550, 19 So. 232, holding that a provision reserving title in the seller of

As to creditors or trustee in bankruptcy.

While the courts are in harmony in holding that the purchaser from the conditional-sale purchaser obtains a good title to the property, if he purchased in good faith and paid a valuable consideration, they are not agreed as to the rights of creditors of the conditional-sale purchaser. As heretofore pointed out, in some jurisdictions, and notably in the Federal courts, it is held that where the owner of property sells it and reserves title until payment of the purchase price, but authorizes the buyer to resell in the ordinary course of business, he thereby clothes the buyer with the indicia of ownership, and the reservation constitutes a fraud upon creditors, and hence it is void.<sup>8</sup> And, so far as the cases disclose, it is immaterial whether goods sold for the express or implied purpose of resale is fraudulent and void as to a subsequent purchaser without notice of the condition, although he was a creditor, and the consideration was the satisfaction of his debt. To the same effect is Parry Mfg. Co. v. Lowenberg (1906) 88 Miss. 532, 41 So. 65.

<sup>4</sup> Lett v. Eastern Moline Plow Co. (1910) 46 Ind. App. 56, 91 N. E. 978, holding that a reservation-of-title provision incorporated in a contract for the sale of a stock of goods was valid and effective as against a subsequent purchaser of the stock in bulk. The Winchester Wagon Works Case infra, note 8, was distinguished on the ground that in that case the purchaser purchased in the ordinary course of trade.

Burlbank v. Crooker (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470, sustaining the validity of a contract for the sale of a stock of goods for resale, although the sale was upon condition that the title should not vest in the retail dealer until payment of the purchase price, and a purchaser of the entire stock of goods was held to obtain no title thereto, although sales at retail would have been valid.

<sup>5</sup> Poorman Bros. v. Witman (1892) 49 Kan. 697, 31 Pac. 370, holding that where goods are sold to a retail dealer it will be implied that the parties intend that they are to be resold, and where the manner of sale is not restricted, and the purchaser mortgages his entire stock of goods, including the consigned goods, the purchaser of the goods from the mortgagee acquires a good title as against the original seller.

erty, although he purchased it in bulk, and not in the usual course of trade, where he was without actual or constructive notice of the reservation clause.

<sup>7</sup> Jermyn v. Schweppenhauser (1901) 33 Misc. 603, 68 N. Y. Supp. 153, holding that where, on the sale of fixtures to a dealer, to be placed in a certain building, the title was reserved by the seller, the fact that he consented to their resale, to be placed in this building, did not estop him from asserting title as against some other purchaser.

Brown v. Thurber (1879) 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 322, holding that if goods are sold to a retail dealer, to be placed by him in his stock and sold at retail, the reservation of title in the original seller is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the purchaser. Ludden v. Hazen (1860) 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 650; Bonesteel v. Flack (1864) 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 435; but compare with the New York cases cited in note 10.

Hamilton v. Billington (1894) 163 Pa. 76, 43 Am. St. Rep. 780, 29 Atl. 904, holding that a conditional sale is invalid as to creditors of the vendee, even where there is express or implied power to resell.

Peek v. Heim (1889) 127 Pa. 500, 14 Am. St. Rep. 865, 17 Atl. 984, holding that a reservation of title by the seller of goods intended for resale, while valid as between or not the creditor was a subsequent creditor and extended credit in reliance upon the fictitious credit in this manner secured by the purchaser. Other cases, while not apparently following the theory of fraud, hold that the reservation of title is inconsistent with the express or implied authority to sell, and construe the contract to be an absolute sale and the reservation to constitute a lien which is invalid unless recorded according to the law applicable to liens.<sup>9</sup> The weight of authority, however, upon grounds heretofore pointed out, holds that the mere fact that the conditional-sale purchaser is authorized to sell in the ordinary course of his business, as to his creditors puts him in substantially the same position as that occupied by an the parties, is invalid as to his creditors. To the same effect, see Thompson v. Paret (1880) 94 Pa. 275.

Star Clothing Mfg. Co. v. Nordeman (1906) 118 Tenn. 384, 100 S. W. 93, holding that a conditional sale for the purpose of resale is fraudulent and void as to creditors of the buyer, including his trustee in bankruptcy.

In Pontiac Buggy Co. v. Skinner (1908) 158 Fed. 858, the court reasons that where the agreement is that the purchaser shall hold the proceeds of the sale in trust for the seller as collateral security for the purchase price, it implies that the title is in the purchaser, and hence the attempt to reserve title constitutes a fraud on the creditors of the latter, rendering invalid the reservation as to his trustee in bankruptcy. To the same effect is Re Priege Paint Co. (1910) 175 Fed. 586.

In Re Garcewich (1902) 53 C. C. A. 510, 115 Fed. 87, the rule is stated "that personal property may be sold and delivered under an agreement for the payment of the price at a future day, and the title by express agreement remain in the vendor until the payment of the purchase price. In such a case the payment is strictly a condition precedent, and until the performance the title does not vest in the buyer. It is one of the exceptional cases in which the law tolerates the separation of the apparent from the real ownership of chattels when the honesty of the transaction is made to appear. But when the purpose for which the possession of the property is delivered is inconsistent with the continued ownership of the vendor, the transaction will be presumed fraudulent as against purchasers and creditors."

In Winchester Wagon Works & Mfg. Co. v. Carman (1887) 109 Ind. 31, 58 Am. Rep. 382, 9 N. E. 707, a provision reserving title in the vendor is held to be fraudulent as against a subpurchaser from the original purchaser, where the property was sold for the purpose of resale. The court said that in such case the purposes for which the property was delivered to the original vendee were inconsistent with the continued ownership thereof by the original vendor, and for this reason the condition upon which the sale and delivery were made must be deemed fraudulent and void as against purchasers from the original vendee. Based upon this case as authority, the rule there announced was held to apply to creditors of the trustee in bankruptcy of the vendee, in West v. Fulling (1905) 36 L.R.A.1917B.

Ind. App. 617, 76 N. E. 325. And in Abe v. Summerville (1910) 46 Ind. App. 348, 92 N. E. 658, the rule is declared that a sale of merchandise to be disposed of by the vendee cannot be made conditional, so far as concerns the rest of the creditors and purchasers. In Lett v. Eastern Moline Plow Co. (1910) 46 Ind. App. 58, 91 N. E. 978, the court, following Hench v. Eacock (1898) 21 Ind. App. 444, 52 N. E. 85, holds that a contract for the sale of a stock of goods, reserving title in the seller until the purchase price is paid, is valid as to a subsequent purchaser of the stock in bulk. In so holding the court distinguished West v. Fulling, on the ground that in that case the person asserting title to the goods was the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser, and his right was based upon a provision of the bankruptcy law that the trustee of a bankrupt shall take title to all property which, prior to the filing of the petition, the bankrupt could by any means have transferred; and it is also pointed out that in the Winchester Wagon Works Case the rule was announced as to a purchaser in the ordinary course of trade. In Andre v. Murray (Ind.) post, 667, the trustee in bankruptcy of the buyer was held to have no title to goods purchased by the bankrupt under a contract for the sale of a stock of goods, with a reservation of title to the proceeds, but with permission to resell.

<sup>9</sup> Re Perkins (1907) 155 Fed. 237, holding that, under the Maine law which requires agreements reserving title in the seller to be recorded to be valid, as well as under the bankruptcy law, the reservation of title to goods sold for resale is invalid as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser.

Flint Wagon Works v. Buttles (1907) 153 Fed. 932, holding that where articles were sold for resale, and there was a provision reserving title in the seller, appearing upon the back of notes executed by the purchaser for the purchase price, which was unknown to him, and the notes were not recorded, such provision is invalid as to the purchaser's trustees in bankruptcy.

Troy Wagon Works Co. v. Hancock (1906) 81 C. C. A. 595, 152 Fed. 605, following West v. Fulling (1905) 36 Ind. App. 617, 76 N. E. 325, holding that, under the Indiana law, a conditional sale of personal property by a manufacturer to a retailer, for the purpose of resale, with an agreement to reserve title in the original seller until paid for, is invalid as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser.

Re Wells (1905) 140 Fed. 752, holding agent under a consignment contract, and the validity of the contract of sale is sustained as to creditors.<sup>10</sup> that a stipulation that the title to goods consigned for resale shall remain in the consignor until paid for, even though valid as between the parties, is of no avail as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the consignee.

In Re Rabenau (1902) 118 Fed. 471, holding that where, by the terms of the contract, styled a consignment contract, all risk of the consigned goods rested upon the consignee, and he was entitled to pay for them at any time, and the consignor had the option to require him to purchase unsold goods, the transaction is a sale, and the property passes to the trustee in bankruptcy of the consignee, notwithstanding a provision reserving title in the goods to the consignor until paid for, where the contract was not registered as a conditional-sale contract.

Re Howland (1901) 109 Fed. 869, holding that, under the law of New York, where merchandise is sold on conditional sale, with an understanding that it is to be dealt with in the same manner as other property owned by the purchaser, the sale is inconsistent with the continued ownership of the property by the seller, and it is subject to seizure and sale upon execution by the creditors of the purchaser, and upon the bankruptcy of the latter, it passes to his trustee. To the same effect is Re Garcewich (1902) 53 C. C. A. 510, 115 Fed. 87. But see New York cases cited in the next note.

In Re Pierce (1907) 87 C. C. A. 537, 157 Fed. 755, holding that, under a statute of North Dakota declaring to be void as to subsequent creditors without notice, and purchasers and encumbrancers in good faith and for value, reservations of title unless recorded, the fact that property is sold for the purpose of resale does not render invalid a reservation of title thereto as against a trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser, since the trustee is neither a subsequent creditor without notice nor a purchaser or encumbrancer.

In Re Dunlop (1907) 86 C. C. A. 435, 156 Fed. 545, holding that, as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser under the law of Minnesota, as well as under the general rule as established by the weight of authority, the fact that the sale of goods is for the purpose of resale by the purchaser does not render invalid a provision reserving to the seller title to the goods and the proceeds thereof until he has been paid in full, since the trustee in bankruptcy, in the absence of fraud, has no better title than the bankrupt and his creditors had at the time of filing the petition in bankruptcy L.R.A.1917B.

On this point there is in Michigan apparently a conflict between the state and Federal courts. According to the deci-which resulted in the adjudication. And this rule is not affected by a statutory provision rendering voidable such a reservation as to bona fide purchasers, attaching and judgment creditors, unless the contract is recorded.

Thornton v. Cook (1893) 97 Ala. 630, 12 So. 403, holding that where a purchase is upon condition,—being the payment of the purchase price, with authority in the purchaser to resell and pay the purchase price from the proceeds,—in making such sales he acts as agent of the seller and the title remains in the latter; hence, the property is not subject to attachment by the creditors of the purchaser.

Triplett v. Mansur, & T. Implement Co. (1900) 68 Ark. 230, 82 Am. St. Rep. 284, 57 S. W. 261, holding to be valid as to the creditors of the buyer a contract for the sale of goods which contained a provision reserving title to the goods and to proceeds of resales thereof, although the buyer was a retail dealer and was authorized to resell the goods.

Perkins v. Mettler (1899) 126 Cal. 100, 58 Pac. 384, holding to be a conditional sale, and valid as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser, a contract for the sale of a stock of goods, reserving title in the seller until the purchase price was paid.

Lewis v. McCabe (1881) 49 Conn. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 217, holding that a reservation of title in a contract for the sale of goods to be sold at retail is valid as to creditors of the retail dealer, for, where honestly made, such a contract is not violative of any principles of public policy, on the ground that it is calculated to give one clothed with the possession a false credit, or as holding the conditional purchaser out to the world as the absolute owner. Approved in Wheeler v. New Haven Wire Co. (1889) — Conn. —, 16 Atl. 393; Mack v. Story (1889) 57 Conn. 407, 18 Atl. 707.

In Flint Wagon Works v. Maloney (1911) 3 Boyce (Del.) 137, 81 Atl. 502, it is reasoned that "there can be no doubt about the intention of the parties to the contract in the present case. Unquestionably they intended that, as between themselves, the title to the property should remain in the seller until paid for. It may be very fairly presumed that the seller intended that the buyer should sell the property in the regular course of his business, and thereby become able to pay for the same. It may be just as fairly presumed that the seller intended that anyone who purchased the property from the vendee in the regular course of his business would have a good title thereto. This is all meant, or implied, in every conditional sale of goods to a retail dealer. But, can the contract, by any fair and reasonable construction, be held to mean that the creditors of the vendee could seize the property for the payment of his sions of the state court, construed as a whole, including MISHAWAKA WOOLEN MFG. CO. v. STANTON, ante, 651, contracts for the sale of property, with a reservation of title, are conditional sales, and are valid as to the creditors of the buyer, debts? We think not. There is, as we have said, a provision in the contract that clearly negatives such a meaning. But, independent of that, we are of the opinion that such a construction would be unwarranted. In order that the property might be liable for the debts of the vendee the title must have been in the vendee, which certainly could not be under the law as we understand it. But it is not necessary for the protection of an innocent purchaser that title shall be in the vendee, because when a vendor makes a conditional sale to a retail dealer he agrees, not that the title to the property shall vest in the vendee, but that he will not assert his title against an innocent purchaser from such vendee, when he knew, and had impliedly agreed, that the property might be sold by the vendee in the regular course of his business."

See Indiana cases, note 8.

Rogers v. Whitehouse (1880) 71 Me. 222, holding that a reservation of title to the goods sold to a retail dealer for resale is valid as to creditors and the assignee in insolvency of the purchaser. It is said that there is no legal objection to the wholesale dealer making a conditional sale to a retailer with the understanding that he might dispose of the goods as they may be called for at retail, but, as between themselves, the property should not pass until the goods were paid for. In such case, while the purchaser at retail will get a title which the original vendor could not impeach, it will be the latter's title, and not that of the retailer, for he had none, and could convey none except in the manner in which his arrangement with the vendor is permitted.

Bradley, C. & Co. v. Benson (1904) 93 Minn. 91, 100 N. W. 670, holding that the fact that a contract for the sale of property to be resold by the purchaser reserves title thereto until the seller has been paid the purchase price does not change its character from one of conditional sale to one of absolute sale with the reservation of a lien, and where the statute does not require a conditional-sale contract to be recorded as against general creditors of the purchaser, it is valid, and the title remains in the seller, as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser.

Cole v. Mann (1875) 62 N. Y. 1, holding the fact that the purchaser was a dealer in goods of the kind purchased, and that authority was given to him to sell the articles, provided he remitted the proceeds immediately to the seller, did not operate to pass the title to him, for if he sold under this authority, he sold as agent of the seller and the authority to sell did not affect the contract as to his creditors.

Prentiss Tool & Supply Co. v. Schirmer (1892) 136 N. Y. 305, 32 Am. St. Rep. 737, 32 N. E. 849, holding that where the purchaser was permitted to manufacture materials embraced in a contract of conditional sale containing a clause reserving title in the seller, and to sell the manufactured articles upon condition that the proceeds of the sale shall be accounted for and paid to the seller, to apply upon the purchase price, the provision did not impair the rights of the latter under the instrument, or render it void as to the creditors of the purchaser. Frank v. Batten (1888) 49 Hun, 91, 1 N. Y. Supp. 705, holding that the fact that under a contract for the sale of property upon the condition that the title was not to pass until the purchase price was paid, the purchaser had the right to manufacture and sell it for the seller, turning the proceeds of the sale over to the latter to the extent necessary to pay the purchase price, does not render the contract invalid or unenforceable as to the creditors of the purchaser. The contrary, however, was held in the earlier decisions by the courts of inferior jurisdiction. Ludden v. Hazen (1860) 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 650, holding that a reservation of title in the sale of liquor to a retail dealer for the purpose of resale will not prevent the title from passing to the purchaser, and it is subject to execution by his creditors. To the same effect is Bonesteel v. Flack (1864) 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 435.

In Devlin v. O'Neill (1875) 6 Daly (N. Y.) 305, it is held that there can be no such thing as a conditional sale of goods which are placed in the possession of the purchaser, to be sold at retail, and they cannot be reclaimed by the seller from execution creditors of the buyer. This case was affirmed on appeal in (1877) 68 N. Y. 622, but the appeal did not present this specific question, for the holding of the lower court in this regard was in favor of the defendant, and the verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff as to other matters presented, and he did not appeal; the only appeal being by the defendant.

E. M. Brash Cigar Co. v. Wilson (1911) 32 Okla. 153, 121 Pac. 223, holding that where a person is appointed agent to sell goods for his principal, the title to remain in the latter until the goods are paid for in cash, and, in compliance with an order from the agent, the principal ships goods C. O. D. to a customer, the title remains in the principal, and the goods are not subject to attachment for the debts of the agent.

Hirsch v. Steele (1894) 10 Utah, 18, 36 Pac. 40, holding to be valid as to the creditors of the buyer a contract for the sale of goods to be resold at retail, which reserves title to the goods.

Armington v. Houston (1866) 38 Vt. 448, 91 Am. Dec. 366, declaring, where property is sold upon condition that the title shall not pass until payment, but upon the understanding that it is to be sold by the buyer in the ordinary course of his business, that the seller is estopped from asserting any right to it adverse to the right of a pur-even though they contain a provision authorizing the buyer to resell the goods. This has been held where the contract contained a provision reserving title to the proceeds of the resale,<sup>11</sup> and also where there was no such provision.<sup>12</sup> chaser in good faith and without notice of the condition; but, as between the original parties, the right to the property is to be determined according to their intentions and the contract, and the creditors of the purchaser have no greater rights in this regard than he would have.

In Pratt v. Burhans (1891) 84 Mich. 487, 22 Am. St. Rep. 703, 47 N. W. 1064, the title was reserved to goods sold for resale. The contract also provided that when the goods were sold, accounts therefor were to belong to the consignor. The reservation was held to be valid as to a subsequent purchaser who did not purchase in due course of trade. The court said that the contract was valid under their repeated decisions.

In American Harrow Co. v. Deyo (1903) 134 Mich. 639, 96 N. W. 1055, it is held that a contract for the sale of goods to a retail dealer for resale, in which the seller reserved title to the goods and to the proceeds of the sale thereof until the purchase price was paid in full, was a conditional sale, and not a mortgage, and hence, although the contract was not recorded, the seller was entitled to hold the property as against the purchaser's trustee in bankruptcy.

The latest decision of the Michigan supreme court on the question is the case under annotation, MISHAWAKA WOOLEN MFG. CO. v. STANTON, ante, 658. It was there held that a reservation-of-title clause, including the right to the proceeds of sales, was valid and enforceable against the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser. The court points out that the principles applied in Pratt v. Burhans and F. J. Dewes Brewery Co. v. Merritt were reaffirmed in the cases of American Harrow Co. v. Deyo and Worden Grocer Co. v. Blanding, and it is said that the distinction attempted to be made in the case under consideration was also attempted in Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Westveer; and while the court points out that the contract in that case and in the case under consideration differed in that the contract construed in the latter case contained a clause reserving a right to the proceeds of sales, which was absent in the contract construed in the former case, it is, however, pointed out that in John Deere Plow Co. v. Mowry it was conceded that in the Mishawaka Case special reliance was placed on the fact "that the contract did not attempt to preserve to the vendor a

When the question was first presented to the Federal court, it refused to follow these decisions, on the ground that later decisions of the Michigan court had overruled or limited the doctrine of these cases;<sup>13</sup> and it was pointed out that the substituted title to the proceeds when the goods were sold, and that in the present case this reservation is in terms made; but we are not satisfied, taking all the conditions together, to treat this as a controlling distinction." The Michigan court concludes that, after a careful review of their decisions, "we are of the opinion that the position of the plaintiff is the correct one, and that the trial court reached the correct conclusion upon the subject. The views of the defendant cannot prevail without overruling the repeated decisions of this court, which have become fundamental in business transactions in this state."

In Van Den Bosch v. Bouwman (1904) 138 Mich. 624, 110 Am. St. Rep. 336, 101 N. W. 832, the question presented was whether or not the seizure and sale of the property for default of the buyer operated to bar any right of action on notes given for the purchase price. According to the contract, the title, ownership, and possession did not pass from the seller until notes given for the purchase price were paid in full, and the latter had the right to take possession of the property at any time he deemed himself insecure, even before maturity of the notes; and, upon taking possession, he was authorized to sell the property, either at public or private sale, without notice, or he might retain the same without sale. In such case the amount paid upon the note would be deemed to be compensation only for the use, wear, and tear of the property. The court said that these provisions gave the seller two options.

rule had been applied by subsequent Michigan decisions only where the contract had contained a provision reserving title in the seller to the proceeds of any resales. And apparently upon the ground that the contract under consideration did not contain such a clause, it was held invalid as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the buyer.<sup>14</sup> This distinction between such contracts, however, was repudiated in subsequent decisions of the Federal court, and the doctrine was asserted that a reservation of title cannot stand as a conditional sale unless, taking the entire contract and circumstances together, it is clearly dominant over the right of resale and other inconsistent features of the contract. In other words, the facts as a whole must be consistent with the theory that resales are to be made by the vendee as agent or consignee.<sup>15</sup>

In the abstract this doctrine is not necessarily inconsistent with the result reached in the cases decided by the Michigan court, for they seems to be based upon the ground that, as a matter of law, under such a permission to sell, the conditional buyer acts as agent for the seller. In the result reached, however, as pointed out, there is a conflict between the Federal and state courts. In this connection it is to be noted that MISHAWAKA WOOLEN MFG. CO. v. STANTON points out that the early Michigan cases referred to still represent the law of that state upon this point, and were in no way limited or overruled by the cases relied upon by the Federal court. The STANTON CASES, however, did not expressly disapprove of the Westveer Case, although it apparently did of the John Deere Plow Co. Case; but in subsequent cases the Federal court has apparently taken the position that the STANTON CASE did not disapprove of either of these Federal decisions.<sup>16</sup> The Federal court of appeals has also held that the decisions of the Federal Supreme Court, construing contracts of this

1. He could retake the property and treat the amount paid as a payment for its use, wear and tear. 2. He was authorized to seize and sell the property at public or private sale. Where he pursues the latter course, the question is, upon whose account that sale was made under the terms of the contract.

In Choate v. Stevens (1898) 116 Mich. 28, 43 L.R.A. 277, 74 N. W. 289, the question under consideration was as to the negotiability of notes given for the purchase price of a soda fountain which was not sold for the purpose of resale, and the case is hence inapplicable to the question under consideration. The provision relied upon was that the parties agreed that the title to the property should remain in the seller, and, in case of nonpayment at maturity of the notes given for the purchase price, he might enter and retain immediate possession of the property without process of law, wherever it might be, and remove the same. As to the character of this contract, the court said: if it can be said that this writing shows the sale of the soda fountain, as contradistinguished from a contract to sell, the provision as to title amounts to no more than a chattel mortgage.

<sup>14</sup> Wishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Westveer (1911) 112 C. C. A. 109, 191 Fed. 465, holding to be a chattel mortgage, and not a contract of conditional sale a contract for the sale of goods to a retail dealer, which contained a reservation of title, and authorized the resale of the property covered thereby, but which did not expressly reserve title to the proceeds of the sale. Upon this latter ground, the court very largely based its right to construe the instrument to be a chattel mortgage, and not a conditional-sale contract, apparently overlooking L.R.A.1917B.

the fact that the Michigan supreme court had made no distinction between the two classes of contracts, holding them both to be contracts of conditional sale, and valid as to creditors of the purchaser, although the property was sold with express or implied authority to resell it.

<sup>15</sup> In John Deere Plow Co. v. Mowry (1915) 137 C. C. A. 539, 222 Fed. 1, the contract provided that the title to and ownership of all the goods shipped as "herein provided, or upon the terms and during the life of this contract, and which shall embrace and include any and all goods that may hereafter be ordered shipped, shall remain in and their proceeds in case of sale shall be in law and in equity the property and moneys of," the seller, and shall be at all times at his order until full payment in cash shall have been made to and accepted by said seller. This contract was construed to be one of pledge or security, and not a conditional sale, and hence it should have been recorded, in accordance with the statute requiring the recording of chattel mortgages; and since not recorded, it was invalid as to the trustees in bankruptcy of the purchaser.

In Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Croll (1916) 145 C. C. A. 565, 231 Fed. 679, the court also refused to regard MISHAWAKA WOOLEN MFG. CO. v. STANTON, ante, 651, as controlling, although the contract there under consideration contained a provision by which the purchaser agreed to hold the goods on hand, and the proceeds of all sales of all goods received under the contract, as collateral security, in trust and for the benefit of and subject to the order of the seller until the purchase price was paid in cash, and to sur-character according to the Arkansas decisions,<sup>17</sup> are not controlling as to a Michigan contract, although the question as presented was substantially the same.<sup>18</sup> In this connection attention is called to the fact that, by a recent statute (Mich. Pub. Acts 1915, act 64) in Michigan, conditional contracts of sale, with the right to resell, are required to be recorded except as to the immediate parties. It has been intimated by the Federal court that the effect of this statute will be to render valid contracts of this character which are recorded.

It is, of course, possible to point out many matters of minor difference in these different contracts. Yet in their essentials the contracts construed by the Michigan supreme court and the Federal Supreme Court cannot be distinguished from those construed by the Federal courts of inferior jurisdiction. They all reserve title to the consigned goods, and some of them to the proceeds. This clause, however, is absent both in contracts construed by the Michigan supreme court and by the Federal circuit court of appeals. Laying aside minor points of difference, it is clear that the Michigan supreme court and the Federal Supreme Court hold that such contracts are contracts of conditional sale, with the implied or express power in the purchaser to resell. The fact that this power exists, however, does not tend to invalidate the contract, nor does it affect its character. It is still one of conditional sale; the reservation clause is valid, and the seller may reclaim the property from anyone other than a bona fide purchaser for value from the buyer, including the latter's trustee in bankruptcy.

It has been held that a provision by which the purchaser of a stock of goods sold with the intention that they be resold at retail agrees that the stock shall be kept up, and that the original stock and the repurchased portions shall belong to the seller until the purchase price has been paid in full, is invalid both as to creditors and subsequent purchasers of the buyer. This character of contract is to be distinguished from the ordinary reservation-of-title clause, for such an agreement shows a disposition and intention by the seller not only to protect his own property from seizure and sale by creditors of a purchaser, but also to have security extend to and embrace property acquired from others, thereby preventing such persons from securing their pay from any part of the purchaser's property, including such as they sold him.<sup>19</sup>

And it has been held that if it is not clear and definite whether or not a contract is a conditional sale or a chattel mortgage, in equity it will be construed to be the latter. And where a contract for the sale of a stock of goods authorized its resale, and contained a provision that the title to the property sold and that subsequently acquired by the purchaser in keeping up the stock should be and remain in the vendor until full payment of the purchase price, and, upon render to the seller at any time he should demand the goods received under the contract, as well as their proceeds.

<sup>17</sup> Bryant v. Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. (1908) 214 U. S. 279, 53 L. ed. 997, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, following the law of Arkansas, and holding that a contract was a conditional sale, and not a mortgage, where it provided for the sale of a stock of goods to be resold and the stock kept up by the purchaser, and that a reservation by the seller of the right to the possession of the property and the proceeds thereof until he was paid was valid as to a trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser. The court said that there was nothing in the nature of such a contract which would forbid the parties entering into it if it was valid by the laws of the state where made, and in bankruptcy proceedings the validity of such a contract must be determined by the local laws.

And see Ludvigh v. American Woolen Co. (1913) 231 U. S. 522, 58 L. ed. 345, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, construing a substantially similar contract under the Arkansas rule, which is similar to the Michigan law in that neither requires such contracts to be recorded, and holding that provisions reserving title in the seller are valid as to creditors and trustees of the buyer, although a resale was contemplated by the parties to the contract.

<sup>18</sup> Re Stoughton Wagon Co. (1916) 145 C. C. A. 562, 231 Fed. 676, holding to be inapplicable Bryant v. Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. and Ludvigh v. American Woolen Co. (U. S.) supra.

In Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Croll (Fed.) supra, the court reviews the MISHAWAKA WOOLEN MILLS CO. v. STANTON, and holds that this case does not affect the rule of construction as declared by the Federal courts, and the court also refuses to follow the Federal Supreme Court decision in Ludvigh v. American Woolen Co. (U. S.) supra, pointing out that the decision applied the Arkansas law, and, according to the contract there involved, the net proceeds of sales were to be accounted for to the consignor, and the consignee was pledged to sell the goods and collect and pay over the proceeds to the consignor.

default by the vendee, the vendor might take possession thereof, it will be construed to be a chattel mortgage, and not a conditional sale, and hence, where not recorded as required by the law relative to chattel mortgages, it is invalid as to creditors of the purchaser.<sup>20</sup>

Where a provision reserving title to goods sold for the purpose of resale is not made in good faith, and is not intended by the parties to be actually complied with, and is not in fact complied with, it is invalid as to the trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser, although such agreements are not required to be recorded.<sup>21</sup>

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

DAVID W. ANDRE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN G. MURRAY et al.

(179 Ind. 576, 101 N. E. 81.)

Sale — condition — bankruptcy — priority.

A stock of goods sold with reservation of title in the vendor until the purchase price is paid, but which may be resold at retail, will not pass to a trustee in bankruptcy of the purchaser as against the claim of the vendor to possession of the property for the purchaser's default.

(March 11, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in defendant's favor in an action brought to reform a contract of sale, to recover possession of goods found and taken on a writ of replevin, and the value of the goods not found. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Finley H. Gray, L. L. Broadus, and George C. Florea for appellant.

Messrs. Wiles & Springer, Conner & Conner and E. G. Johnston for appellees.

Erwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action in replevin. The only error assigned arises on the sustaining of appellees' demurrer to the complaint. Appellant alleges in his complaint that on May 28, 1906, he conditionally sold and delivered to appellee John G. Murray and one Edwards a retail stock of drugs and other property, located in a certain business room in Connersville, Indiana.

The contract of sale was in writing, and is as follows: "This indenture witnesseth: That David W. Andre, of the city of Connersville, in the county of Fayette, in the State of Indiana, has this 28th day of May, 1906, for the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, and full compliance with the terms and conditions thereof, sold and transferred to John G. Murray and J. Arthur Edwards, of said city, county, and state, the following described personal property and chattels, located in said city, county, and state, and described as follows, to wit: All the vendor's stock of retail drugs, sundries, paints, oils, liquors, the same to include all retail stock on hand of vendor of every description, now located in what is known as the Opera House Drug Store Room, at No. 128 W. Fifth street, in said city; also seven show cases, two pair of scales, and one prescription scale, located in said room. The terms and conditions, above mentioned, are that said vendees shall pay to said vendor the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of six (6) per cent per annum from date hereof until paid, said sum and interest thereon to be payable in monthly instalments of not less than twenty ($20) dollars each, the same to be applied, first, to the payment of interest, and the balance to said principal; the first instalment coming due at the expira-

Note.—The question as to the effect on a conditional-sale contract of express or implied permission to the buyer to resell the goods is covered in a note appended to Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Stanton, ante, 658, and the question as to whether or not a sale with a reservation of title and permission to resell, together with other provisions peculiar to contracts of consignment, is a contract of sale or agency, is covered, among other questions, in a note appended to D. M. Ferry & Co. v. Hall, ante, 626. It is to be noted that these notes deal with the substantive questions relative to L.R.A.1917B.

the construction of the contract. They include cases where the buyer had become bankrupt after purchasing the goods, and the rights of his trustee were involved, but they do not include cases which consider the effect on the rights of the vendor of the fact that the buyer's estate is being adjudicated in bankruptcy. This specific question is covered in a note appended to Myrick v. Liquid Carbonic Co. 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 554, which is limited to the question of the right of the vendor, as affected by the bankruptcy of the purchaser.

tion of one month from the date hereof, and one instalment at the expiration of each month thereafter, until the whole amount of principal and interest is paid. The retail stock shall remain where the same is now located until said sum, together with all interest thereon, is paid in full; and until said principal sum and interest is paid said vendees shall keep said stock renewed and replenished, so that same shall at all times be maintained at not less than the cash value, at wholesale, in amount equal to the unpaid balance of said sum and interest, and said stock so added to stand hereunder in place of stock sold. That vendees shall pay to vendor, as rent for said room where said retail stock is now located, the sum of $8.25 each week until said principal of $2,000 and interest is paid; the first weekly payments thereof coming due one week from date hereof, and one payment of $8.25 coming due each week thereafter until said principal and interest is paid, as above provided."

It is also averred in the complaint that by the mutual mistake of each of the parties to the contract, and by the mistake of the scrivener who drafted the same, the provision "that the title to all of said property shall be and remain in the said vendor until full payment of said purchase price, and that upon default of said vendees in any of the conditions, that said vendor shall be entitled to the possession thereof," was omitted from said agreement, as reduced to writing; that subsequently Edwards sold and assigned his interest in the property to Murray, who assumed the obligations of the original contract of purchase.

It is further averred that on July 28, 1908, Murray and Edwards made default, in that they failed and refused to pay the monthly instalment of principal and interest then due, and informed the appellant that they would pay no further amounts upon said contract, and that on said date there was a balance of said purchase price and interest unpaid in the sum of $1,727.50; that on said day the vendees made further default, in that they had failed to keep said stock renewed, as provided, but had sold and reduced the same, so that said stock did not exceed $1,000, wholesale value, including renewal goods, and that the value of the original goods remaining did not exceed $200; that on said day appellee Murray, assuming to own said property, assigned the same as a failing debtor to appellee John Payne, as assignee for the benefit of his bona fide creditors; that after the bringing of the original action, upon petition of creditors of Murray and of the partnership of Murray & Edwards, said Murray, individually, and said partnership L.R.A.1917B.

were adjudged involuntary bankrupts, and that appellee Charles W. Neff was duly appointed trustee in bankruptcy; that by the proceedings in bankruptcy the assignment to John Payne was superseded and annulled.

The prayer is for a reformation of the contract, so that the same shall include the omitted conditions, as agreed upon, judgment for the possession of the goods found and taken on the writ of replevin, and for the value of the goods not found.

The appellees separately filed demurrers to the complaint for want of sufficient facts, which demurrers were sustained by the court. Appellant refusing to plead further, and electing to abide by his complaint and exception to the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer thereto, judgment was rendered for the return of the property taken on the writ of replevin to appellee Neff, trustee in bankruptcy, and that defendants recover costs.

As the demurrer admits the truth of all facts well pleaded, we must, in considering the legal sufficiency of the complaint, treat the same as including the omitted stipulation in regard to title remaining in the vendor.

The contention between the parties in this cause is the construction to be given the contract between appellant and the parties to whom he sold the stock of drugs.

It is contended by the appellant that the contract makes a conditional sale; and that the ownership of goods is, by the terms of the contract, retained by appellant until the price therefor has been paid. The appellees contend that the delivery of the goods with the provision that they should be sold by the purchaser at retail is inconsistent with a conditional sale; and that title passed to the purchaser, his creditors and assigns.

It is well settled by the authorities in this and other states that a sale of a stock of goods to be sold at retail authorizes the vendee to sell it in the regular course of trade at retail, and the purchaser will take title thereto. Thomas v. Winter, 12 Ind. 322; Shireman v. Jackson, 14 Ind. 459; Hodson v. Warner, 60 Ind. 214; Dunbar v. Rawles, 28 Ind. 225, 92 Am. Dec. 311; Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Arthurhultz, 63 Ind. 322; Bradshaw v. Warner, 54 Ind. 58; Payne v. June, 92 Ind. 252; Lanman v. McGregor, 94 Ind. 301; Sears v. Shrout, 24 Ind. App. 313, 56 N. E. 728.

Some of the decisions of the court in this state have seemingly gone so far as to hold that a transaction of this kind should be considered as an absolute sale, and that the contract should be treated as a chattel mortgage, holding that the right given the vendee to sell at retail is inconsistent with the retention of title in the vendor. In none of the cases so holding has the exact question presented in this case been determined; none of them involving a sale other than at retail and in due course of trade.

In the case of Winchester Wagon Works & Mfg. Co. v. Carman, 109 Ind. 31, 58 Am. Rep. 382, 9 N. E. 707, the facts shown were that the vendee had sold the wagons in question in due course of trade, and at retail. In the case of Steele v. Aspy, 128 Ind. 367, 27 N. E. 739, the vendor's administrator undertook to have a receiver appointed to take charge of a stock of goods sold to Steele by one Nelson, deceased. That case is not in point here, for the reason that there was no condition in said contract that the ownership of the goods should be retained by the vendor until payment should be made therefor; the only condition being that the goods should not be removed from the town of Geneva where located,—a thing he was not attempting to do.

It is well settled by the authorities in this and other states that a sale of goods, where title is retained in the vendor, with the privilege to the vendee to sell the same at retail, does not authorize the sale of such a stock of goods in bulk. McGirr v. Sell, 60 Ind. 249; Hench v. Eacock, 21 Ind. App. 444, 52 N. E. 85; Lett v. Eastern Moline Plow Co. 46 Ind. App. 56-63, 91 N. E. 978; Pratt v. Burhans, 84 Mich. 487, 22 Am. St. Rep. 703, 47 N. W. 1064; Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222; Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray, 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470; Perkins v. Mettler, 126 Cal. 100, 58 Pac. 384; Triplett v. Mansur & T. Implement Co. 68 Ark. 230, 82 Am. St. Rep. 284, 57 S. W. 261; Marvin Safe Co. v. Norton, 48 N. J. L. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 566, 7 Atl. 418; Bunday v. Columbus Mach. Co. 143 Mich. 10, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 475, 106 N. W. 397.

In the case of Hench v. Eacock, 21 Ind. App. 444, 52 N. E. 85, the same question was involved as is presented in this cause, and it was held that, while the contract would permit a sale of the goods in question at retail, it did not warrant a sale in bulk, and that the original vendor might retake the goods from a mortgagee of the vendee. In the case of McGirr v. Sells, supra, that being an action in replevin to recover two barrels of whisky, sold by appellee to one McCoy on a contract conditioned that the title should not pass until payment should be made in full, and which goods were levied on and offered for sale to satisfy an execution in the hands of a constable, which execution was issued upon a judgment in favor of other creditors than appellee, Warden, J., in that case (60 Ind. on page 257) uses this language: "If the plaintiff had authorized McCoy to sell the whisky at wholesale, that would have ended the question; . . . but his authority to McCoy to retail, in his own name, did not necessarily carry the inference that the title to the liquors was in the latter. This was the purpose for which the liquors were placed in his possession, and was consistent with the plaintiff's ownership of the property."

In the case of Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470, involving a sale of a stock of goods, in bulk, in a country store, bought conditionally that the title should not pass until paid for, the court, speaking by Dewey, J., held that the purchaser took no better title than that held by the original vendee, but says that, had sale been made of individual articles in the ordinary course of business, a different rule would prevail; and that the plaintiff might have been estopped to assert any right adverse to such purchaser.

In the case of Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222, supra, Whitehouse being assignee for the benefit of creditors, that court held that a conditional sale of goods to a retail merchant is binding upon him and his assignees, but not upon vendees in the regular course of business; and that one to whom he sells the whole stock took no title. Neither would his assignees in bankruptcy.

It is insisted that, as the contract of sale provides for the payment of rent, this is conclusive as to the nature of the transaction, and is conclusive that the instrument is a chattel mortgage. This is a question we are not called upon to decide, as the failure to pay rent is not alleged as one of the breaches of the contract. Neither does the contract make any provision as to return of the property on failure to pay rent.

The case of West v. Fulling, 36 Ind. App. 617, 76 N. E. 325, seems to hold that the right to retail carries with it in all cases title to the property transferred, and that a contract retaining title in the seller is void as against creditors and trustee in bankruptcy, citing the Bankruptcy Act, as follows: That the trustee of a bankrupt shall take title to all property which, prior to the filing of the petition, he could, by any means, have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him. The stock of goods could not have been transferred in bulk, neither could it be levied upon by execution and sold to satisfy creditors other than the original vendor; and, in so far as that case holds that the same may be taken by the trustees in bankruptcy, the same is overruled.

It appears from the averments of the complaint that at least $200 worth of goods, originally purchased under the conditional contract, are still on hand. As to this property received from the original vendor, appellant herein is clearly entitled to recover; and the complaint stated a good cause of action as to that part of the property. As to the after-acquired property, we express no opinion.

The court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint.
Judgment reversed.

Morris, J., did not participate.

Petition for rehearing denied May 29, 1913.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

LEWIS SHARPLESS, Respt.,

v.

GRAND LODGE OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN OF THE STATE OF MINNESOTA, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(— Minn. —, 159 N. W. 1086.)

Insurance — murder of insured — effect.

1. Though by murdering the insured the beneficiary forfeits the right to the proceeds of the policy, such murder does not absolve the insurer from liability to others.

For other cases, see Insurance, VI. b, 2, a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — right of heir.

2. In such case the sole heir of the deceased, who would take upon the death of an eligible beneficiary, may recover.

has no right whatsoever to the fraternal insurance of his testator. The fund goes to the heirs of the deceased as beneficiaries, and not by descent.

Devaney v. Ancient Order of Hibernians Life Ins. Fund, 122 Minn. 221, 142 N. W. 316.

In case the designation of a beneficiary proves for any reason to be invalid or ineffectual, the fund goes to such person or persons as are eligible to take the benefits in the manner prescribed by statute, or by the laws of the society, or the certificate of insurance, even though the beneficiary named was eligible at the time he was so named, but became ineligible thereafter.

Dibell, C. filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff, Lewis Sharpless, brings this action to recover upon a policy of insurance on the life of Leaming Sharpless issued by the defendant Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. Charlotta A. Sharpless was named as beneficiary. She is a defendant. The Grand Lodge answers separately. The plaintiff demurred. The appeal is from the order sustaining the demurrer.

The pertinent facts appearing from the complaint are these: On March 6, 1905, the policy or benefit certificate was issued on the life of Leaming Sharpless. The beneficiary, Charlotta A. Sharpless, his wife, murdered him on November 14, 1914. By murdering him she forfeited the right to take as beneficiary. The plaintiff is the brother and only heir of the deceased except Mrs. Sharpless. These facts are admitted by the defendant order. It alleges that by its constitution a member has no right in the beneficiary fund except to designate a beneficiary; that when a member dies without having designated an eligible beneficiary the certificate is void; that if an eligible beneficiary dies before the member, and he dies without designating another, the proceeds shall be paid first to the widow, then to the children, then to the father and mother or the survivor of them, then to brothers and sisters, and, all failing, there is a reversion to the beneficiary fund; and it claims that the murder of the insured by the beneficiary absolves it from liability on the certificate.

Two questions are presented:

(1) Does the murder of the insured by the beneficiary absolve the insurer from liability, conceding that the right of the beneficiary is forfeited?

(2) If it does not, can the sole heir of the insured, who would take upon the death of an eligible beneficiary, recover?

1. An insurance company is not absolved from liability on a policy because the beneficiary murders the insured. Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. [1892] 1 Q. B. 147, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 128, 66 L. T. N. S. 220, 40 Week. Rep. 230, 56 J. P. 180; Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. 112 Iowa, 41, 51 L.R.A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800; Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhausen, 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. E. 567. The contract of insurance makes no exception in such case and no statute affects liability. The public policy which refuses a recovery for the benefit of the murderer does not prevent a recovery for the benefit of another who has done no wrong. Public policy may not permit the murderer to profit by a recovery on the policy; but it does not excuse the insurer from paying to those who would take in the absence of a beneficiary. The rule of public policy is invoked to prevent the murderer from profiting, not to relieve the insurer from paying.

2. The further question is whether the action is well brought by the plaintiff, who is the sole heir, and who would take in the event of the death of an eligible beneficiary and no subsequent designation. In Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. and Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. supra, it was held that the personal representatives of the deceased might recover and hold the proceeds for those entitled to them or the estate. In Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhausen, supra, it was held that the one entitled to the proceeds as a beneficiary upon the failure of the designated beneficiary could recover. This accords with the policy of our statutes and decisions and we follow it. This matter was considered at some length in Devaney v. Ancient Order of Hibernians Life Ins. Fund, 122 Minn. 221, 142 N. W. 316. We refer to the discussion there had.

Mrs. Sharpless is not interested in the two questions decided. She is not bound by the allegation of the plaintiff and the concession of the defendant order that her claim as beneficiary is forfeited. If she chooses, she can litigate the question.

The general rule, as evidenced by the cases herein and in the earlier note, is that in case an insured is murdered by a beneficiary the beneficiary forfeits all rights to insurance. It will be noticed that where the heirs of the beneficiary have been permitted to recover the proceeds of the policy, they have recovered not as such beneficiary's heirs, but as the heirs of the murdered assured. The question of whether the heirs of a beneficiary who has murdered insured are precluded, as such, from recovering, in case there are no heirs or next of kin of insured, has never been before the courts, the case nearest in point to that question being Anderson v. Life Ins. Co. (N. C.) infra, which was a contest between representatives of insured and those of beneficiary; and see Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. cited in earlier note.

A beneficiary in a life insurance policy, who intentionally kills the assured, forfeits all rights he may have in the policy. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Shane (1911) 98 Ark. 132, 135 S. W. 836; Prather v. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1878) Fed. Cas. No. 11,368; Filmore v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1910) 82 Ohio St. 208, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 675, 137 Am. St. Rep. 778, 92 N. E. 26; Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Weightman (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A.—, —, 160 Pac. 629.

And in McDonald v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. (1916) — Iowa, —, 160 N. W. 289, action on an insurance policy by administrator of insured, who died as the result of a criminal operation performed upon her, it was held that there could be no recovery, as the sole heirs of insured were her parents, who had aided in procuring the performance of the criminal operation.

So, also, the assignee of a beneficiary under an insurance policy has no better claim upon the proceeds than the beneficiary has, and so, if the beneficiary has murdered the insured, the assignee cannot recover. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Weightman (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A.—, —, 160 Pac. 629 (and see Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. (1900) 112 Iowa, 41, 51 L.R.A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800, cited in note in 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 728).

And in Anderson v. Life Ins. Co. (1910) 152 N. O. 1, 67 S. E. 53, action on an insurance contract made by the insured, who was murdered by the beneficiary, the latter having at the same time committed suicide, the question before the court was whether the representatives of the insured or representatives of the beneficiary had the right to the proceeds of the policy; and it was held that the representatives of the insured were entitled to recover. The court added, as dictum, however, that this ruling would very likely not obtain in an ordinary life policy, where a valid contract of insurance had been made, and purported to be between the company and the beneficiary, and such beneficiary was, and continued to be throughout, the owner of the policy and of all interest in it. L.R.A.1917B.

In Lillie v. Modern Woodmen (1911) 89 Neb. 1, 130 N. W. 1004, which affirmed a judgment in favor of beneficiary, who had been convicted of murdering assured, in an action on a benefit certificate, the question of the right of a beneficiary who had murdered insured to recover on the certificate was not before the appellate court, the real question being as to whether a record of her conviction of murder in the criminal courts was admissible in evidence in the action on the benefit certificate, which question was decided in the negative. (For judgment in criminal action as res judicata in civil action, see notes in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 653, and 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 670.)

It is not necessary that there should be an express exception in the contract of insurance forbidding a recovery in favor of a beneficiary who intentionally kills the assured. On considerations of public policy, the death of the insured wilfully and intentionally caused by the beneficiary of the policy is an excepted risk so far as the person thus causing the death is concerned. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Shane (1911) 98 Ark. 132, 135 S. W. 836.

It was held in Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. v. Menkhausen (1904) 209 Ill. 277, 65 L.R.A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239, 70 N. E. 567, that the beneficiary (husband of the insured) having deprived himself of the right to enforce a benefit certificate by murdering the insured, the obligation of the society may be enforced by those designated by the statute and the rules of the society as entitled to the fund in the absence of a beneficiary named, who in this case were the children of the insured. The court said that the beneficiary (whose sentence had been commuted to life imprisonment) by his act in taking the life of insured (his wife) placed himself outside the class from among whom, under the rules of the society, she might designate a beneficiary, and he could not therefore take the fund, or any part thereof, either as a beneficiary named in the certificate, or as an heir of his wife; that the situation, so far as his rights and those of the children of the insured and the society are concerned, was precisely the same as though after the issuance of the certificate he had been divorced from the insured, and she had thereafter died without having any alteration made in the certificate; that in such circumstances he would have no interest in the certificate, but the proceeds thereof would be payable to the heirs of the insured, nothing to the contrary appearing in the certificate, the constitution and by-laws of the order, or the laws of the state under which it operates. In reply to the suggestion that the certificate being payable alone to the husband no recovery could be had thereon except by him, or by those claiming through him, and as he could not recover no one could recover on the certificate, the court said that it did not regard the suit as upon the certificate, but rather as a suit to recover the benefit which the society had by its constitution and by-laws agreed to pay to the person (within certain classes) who should be designated by the insured; and that the action was upon the obligation of the society as evidenced by its constitution and by-laws, and not upon the certificate.

The court pointed out that, as the action was by those who claimed as heirs or next of kin of the insured, cases were distinguishable which have held that there could be no recovery where the suit was brought by a beneficiary who had murdered the insured, or by some one claiming through such beneficiary. The court further pointed out that the contract between the society and the insured contained no provision absolving the society from liability in the event that insured was murdered by the beneficiary, and stated that public policy did not require that such condition be read into the agreement. If it did, the court added, it would also require that it be held that the beneficiary could not recover on the policy if the insured were murdered by another acting independently of and against the desire of the beneficiary, because it is within the realm of possibility that such other, without the connivance or knowledge of the beneficiary, might commit the crime solely for the purpose of enriching the latter. If societies of this character, the court stated, desire to be protected from such contingency, that object must be accomplished by a condition to that effect written into their contracts, failing which the law will not absolve them from liability; and in the absence of a contract to that effect, public policy will not permit the society to appropriate unto itself the fund which it has agreed to pay, merely because the life of the insured has been unlawfully taken.

The following cases involve the construction of specific provisions of the by-laws of a beneficial society relating to rights under a certificate where a holder is murdered by the beneficiary, and so in L.R.A.1917B.

a sense are distinguishable from the other cases.

Thus in Grand Circle, W. W. v. Rausch (1913) 24 Colo. App. 304, 134 Pac. 141, action on certificate of a fraternal benevolent society by children of holder of such certificate, who was murdered by her husband, named beneficiary, he at the same time committing suicide, it was held that there could be no recovery, as the holder of the certificate having been killed by a beneficiary, the benefit reverted to the society under the provision of the certificate that "if the member to whom this certificate shall be issued shall be murdered by any beneficiary named herein, . . . or should any beneficiary named in the certificate . . . cause the death of such member directly or indirectly, intentionally or accidentally, then any benefit which such beneficiary might otherwise have received under the provisions of this certificate shall revert to the Grand Circle." In upholding the validity of such provision the court stated: "We are unable to see wherein upholding the conditions upon which the membership of the insured was accepted contravenes any question of sound public policy, while upon the other hand, we do see wherein it may eradicate from the minds of many morally weak beneficiaries temptations which might lead them on to murder. The removal by foul means of those standing between anxious beneficiaries and property interests is quite prevalent. With the publicity of these dangers through many indictments and trials prevailing throughout the country, it is not strange that this society should seek to remove the temptation of anxious expectants to bring about premature death of the insured, and to press the countersuggestion that if beneficiaries in any manner whatever cause the death of insured persons, the Circle penalty shall be a loss of all claims to the benefits provided in the certificate."

In a well-reasoned dissenting opinion, Judge Morgan, after discussing as to whether an insane person could "cause the death of such member, directly or indirectly, intentionally or accidentally," said: "Furthermore, this clause is ambiguous and indefinite in another particular: it is uncertain whether it was intended that the heirs could not recover if the beneficiary named in the certificate caused the death of the insured, or only in case they caused it themselves. The clause provides that 'should any beneficiary named in a member's certificate, or (any beneficiary) who may claim benefits thereunder, (though not named in the certificate) . . . cause the death of any such member, then the rights of such beneficiary (who caused the death) . . . shall revert to the Grand Circle.'

Now aside from the question as to who died first, the husband or the wife, no beneficiary's rights revert, except the one who caused the death. Those who now claim the benefits never caused the death and their rights do not revert. Furthermore, it is not stipulated nor agreed as to which died first, and if the husband died before the wounds produced the death of his wife, his rights as a beneficiary died with him and the right of the heirs immediately took effect. As it was not stipulated nor proved that the wife died first, this defense must fail, because the burden of proof was upon the defendant to prove sufficient facts to establish the conditions of the forfeiture relied upon.

. . . Certainly, it could not have been the intention to impute the wrong of 'beneficiary named in the certificate' to those who 'may claim benefits thereunder,' and thus visit upon the innocent the sin of the guilty. And it would certainly be against public policy and common justice to permit the defendant to have the fund revert to it and thus profit by the crime of the beneficiary named in the certificate so long as these children live and claim it. If the beneficiary becomes ineligible, the heirs of the insured should have the fund. . . . As suggested in the majority opinion, it is a wise provision that prevents the intentional taking of the life of an insured and 'removes the temptation from anxious expectants to bring about premature deaths of the insured,' but are those words in harmony with the conclusion reached? They are in perfect harmony with my conclusion, that the provision was inserted for this purpose only, 'to remove the temptation from anxious expectants,' but not to defeat a recovery by innocent heirs because of the irresponsible act of an insane beneficiary, who killed himself, thus annihilating any suspicion that he was an anxious expectant. The construction of this provision adopted by the majority opinion is disastrous in its effect. Under such construction, no recovery could be had by the heirs if the husband should attempt to catch a runaway horse carrying his wife to certain death, in case the horse should stumble over and kill the husband, and falling, kill the wife; because, forsooth, the proviso says if he 'accidentally or indirectly cause the death' the fund reverts to the Grand Circle. Further illustrations are unnecessary. The provision destroys itself unless it is given a reasonable construction in harmony with the beneficent purposes of the order."

And in Greer v. Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur (1916) — Mo. App. —, 190 S. W. 72, a case similar in many respects to the Rausch Case, which is cited in the Greer Case as sustaining its decision, it was held that the heirs at law of a member of the beneficial society, who was murdered by the beneficiary named in the benefit certificate, were precluded from recovering the benefits by reason of the provision of the by-laws (§ 111) that "if the death of a beneficial member be caused or procured by his beneficiary or beneficiaries, or any of them, then, and in that event, the amount payable under the terms of his beneficial certificate shall be forfeited to the society, and shall become a part of the benefit fund in the class in which he holds his membership in the society for the use of its surviving members, and shall not be paid to the beneficiary or beneficiaries, or his or their heirs, assigns, or personal representatives or to the heirs, assigns, or personal representatives of such beneficial member;" and the further provision (§ 101) that no benefit shall be paid on account of the death of a member who was killed by any of the beneficiaries; and this although the named beneficiary, who murdered the assured, himself committed suicide and died before the assured, and the benefit certificate contained the provision (§ 121) that in the event of the death of a designated beneficiary prior to the death of the member, the member having died without having made disposition of said portion or all of the certificate, the same shall be paid to the legal representatives of said decedent member for the use and benefit of the deceased and his heirs, if any survive. The court in this case said: "The plaintiff contends that the above policy provisions are somewhat conflicting, or at least ambiguous, and should be construed most favorably to uphold the contract and against a forfeiture. . . . The contention is that William Atkins, who is named beneficiary in the policy and who killed his wife, the insured or beneficial member, never in fact became the beneficiary under the policy since he died first by twenty minutes; that he was only a contingent beneficiary when he inflicted the mortal blow; that, when the insured died, the named beneficiary being also dead, her heirs, the real plaintiffs here, became under the policy contract the beneficiaries; and that they did not cause her death. As a corollary to this, plaintiff says that the by-laws . . . providing for the forfeiture of the policy in case the insured's death is caused by the beneficiary, applies only when the designated beneficiary survives the insured member and thereby becomes the beneficiary in fact. This is certainly a very sharp and technical construction of this by-law, and if followed to its necessary conclusion, a beneficial member can never be killed by one who is more than a contingent beneficiary when the mortal blow is inflicted; for, perchance, lightning or some such quick agency might end the life of a slayer before that of his victim. Using the illustration suggested by plaintiff, that a boy is never his father's heir until after the father's death, so the beneficiary, as or being such, never kills the member, because he is not a beneficiary until after the killing is over. . . . It seems to us, however, that there is no conflict in the provisions above mentioned, as they were written for different purposes and accomplish different objects. The provisions of § 121, as the title indicates, relate to live policies,—policies which are valid obligations after the insured's death and are matured by such death,—and provide who shall be entitled to the benefits of such policy in case of the prior death . . . of the named beneficiary. The provisions of § 111, supra (and also § 101), of the by-laws, as the title indicates, relate to a totally different subject; to wit, for forfeiture of policies and the acts and conditions which make same void and have to do with dead policies incapable of enforcement by anyone. There are a number of acts there specified as forfeiting the policy and making it void. . . . Among these acts rendering the policy void and discharging the defendant from any liability to anyone by reason thereof is that of the death of the insured caused by the beneficiary. The by-law in the most positive terms provides that if the death is caused or produced by the beneficiary the amount otherwise payable shall be forfeited to the society and become a part of its funds for the use of the other members; and, to avoid any possible misunderstanding, further specify that such amount shall not be paid to the beneficiary or his heirs, or to the heirs, assigns, or personal representative of such beneficial member, the very persons who are now claiming." The court in the Greer Case pointed out that the provision of the by-laws sustained as a defense in the Rausch Case is not as strong as the one in the Greer Case, since it does not contain the express provision prohibiting payment to the heirs of the insured in case his death is caused by the beneficiary, and said that the court arrived at its conclusion from the words making the benefits revert to the assured.

Under a policy upon the lives of two persons, a husband and wife, providing for the payment of the insurance fund to the survivor of the first decedent, it was held in Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Weightman (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A. —, —, 160 Pac. 629, that where the wife murdered the husband the husband's representatives were entitled to recover. It was contended by the insurance company that the policy was a chose in action owned by the husband and wife as joint tenants; that on the death of the husband the benefits of the policy vested, if at all, in the wife, first, by the terms of the policy itself, and second, by ownership; that the wife by her crime forfeited the right to take by survivorship; that as the law at the time of the murder failed to designate who should take in her stead, the policy lapsed to the insurer. The court, however, denied that they owned the policy as joint tenants, and held that it was a separate policy upon the life of each of the insured for the wholly separate benefit of each of the insured.

And the court held further, that, inasmuch as the contract of insurance designated no alternative payee, in the absence of a statute providing for alternative payee, a resulting trust arose by operation of law in favor of the estate of the murdered assured, and so his representatives were entitled to recover.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF SIMON MIRES, Deceased.

EMMA MATTHEWS, App't.,
v.

CLARA MIRES, Resp't.

(— Minn. —, 160 N. W. 187.)

Incompetent person — employment of guardian.

1. A guardian of an insane person, clothed with the management and control of the ward's property and affairs, is authorized, without first obtaining the approval of the probate court, to employ an attendant to care for and render assistance to the invalid wife of the ward.

For other cases, see Incompetent Persons, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Guardian and ward — claim for services.

2. When such employment is necessary, and the employment is in good faith, without purpose to unnecessarily burden the estate with expense, the reasonable value of the services rendered thereunder is a valid claim against the estate of the ward.

For other cases, see Incompetent Persons, VI. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Executor and administrator — estate of ward — claim for services.

3. If the ward dies before payment, the claim may be presented for allowance in the proceedings for the administration of his estate.

APPEAL by an heir at law of deceased, from an order of the District Court for Goodhue County denying a new trial, and from a judgment affirming a judgment of the Probate Court allowing a claim against decedent's estate for services rendered by claimant under an alleged contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mohn & Mohn, for appellant:

The contract is void, because the guardian had no power to bind her ward or his estate thereby, and if the claimant had a claim by reason of such contract, the only court which had jurisdiction to hear and pass thereon would be the probate court in the guardianship proceedings.

Mr. A. J. Rockne for respondent.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Simon Mires with his wife, two daughters, and a son, resided in Goodhue county. On March 31, 1899, Mires was adjudged insane and by proper authority committed to the insane asylum for treatment, where he remained until his death, which occurred on June 12, 1914. At the time he was so adjudged insane he was the owner of a considerable property, real and personal, of the probable value of about $25,000, for the management and care of which the court appointed one A. W. Eddy as guardian. Eddy continued to serve until 1902, when he resigned, and the wife of Mires was duly commissioned in his stead, and she continued to act as such until January 29, 1914, when she died. She was succeeded at her death by W. E. Weiss, who served until Mires died, in June following as heretofore stated.

During the last few years of her life, Mrs. Mires was an invalid and required the services of a competent person to attend to and care for her necessities and comforts. Her ailment did not affect her mental faculties. One daughter had married and moved from home, and the son had taken up his residence in the state of Oklahoma. The other daughter, respondent herein, about thirty years of age, was engaged as a saleslady in a mercantile establishment at Zumbrota. She was induced to give up her position at the store and return home for the purpose of taking care of her mother, upon the latter's agreement, acting as guardian, to compensate her from the Mires property. She remained in this service and nursed and cared for the mother until her death. In December, 1912, Mrs. Mires, acting as guardian, and respondent, entered into an agreement in writing whereby they mutually agreed that respondent's services were of the value of $1,500; and that amount was agreed upon as full compensation therefor.

After the death of Mires, respondent presented this contract to the probate court as a claim against his estate for the services so rendered. The court allowed the same, and from the order an appeal was taken to the district court. After trial in that court the allowance was affirmed, and judgment ordered for the full amount thereof. The administrator declined further to contest the claim and one of the heirs prosecuted this appeal from an order denying a new trial.

It is contended in support of the appeal (1) That the guardian, Mrs. Mires, was without authority in law to enter into the contract of employment with respondent, and that the claim based thereon is not a legal charge against the estate of the ward; and (2) that the claim, if valid at all, should have been presented to the probate court in the guardianship proceedings in connection with the settlement of the guardian's account.

The questions presented must be considered as though the employment of respondent was by a guardian duly commissioned as such, who was a total stranger to members of the family. The fact that Mrs. Mires the wife of the incompetent, was the guardian, does not change the situation in its legal aspect, for the power of contract was vested in her to the same extent as a stranger acting in the same capacity. In this light the facts presented would seem to make a clear case of a valid employment. There is no question but that Mrs. Mires became an invalid, and that because thereof she required the assistance of someone to attend to daily wants; there is no question that her husband, or, in his absence, his estate and property, was liable for the expense of her care, and that the claim of one lawfully employed to render the service would constitute a valid claim against him. In view of her condition, a guardian having control and management of the husband's estate would be under legal duty to provide for her support, in the performance of which he would be authorized to provide for the necessary care and assistance without first obtaining authority to do so from the probate court. Humphrey v. Buisson, 19 Minn. 221, Gil. 182; Pardoe v. Merritt, 75 Minn. 12, 77 N. W. 552; Re Besondy, 32 Minn. 385, 50 Am. Rep. 579, 20 N. W. 366; 2 Notes to Minn. Rep. 633. He would thus be discharging the personal obligations of his ward, performing an act of no unusual character; and no sound reason appears for holding that the matter should first have been referred to the probate court. Taylor v. Bemiss, 110 U. S. 42, 28 L. ed. 64, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441; McCoy v. Lane, 66 Neb. 847, 92 N. W. 1010; Price's Appeal, 116 Pa. 410, 9 Atl. 856. It is true as a general rule that the guardian has no authority to bind the estate of his ward by contract. Germania Bank v. Michaud, 62 Minn. 459, 30 L.R.A. 286, 54 Am. St. Rep. 653, 65 N. W. 70. But that rule should not apply to acts of the guardian of the character of those here disclosed; acts in performance of duties and obligations of the ward not of an unusual or extraordinary character, and which do not bind or attempt to bind the ward beyond his legal incompetency to act for himself. No question is raised as to the necessity of the employment of someone to care for Mrs. Mires, the good faith of the transaction is not challenged, nor is it urged that the compensation claimed is unreasonable or excessive.

In this state of the case, the abstract question of the validity of the written agreement of settlement, made between Mrs. Mires, as guardian, and respondent, need not be considered. The employment of respondent was lawful, and the rendition by her of services thereunder created a valid claim against her father's estate for the reasonable value of the same. The complaint filed after the appeal to the district court alleged that the services were reasonably worth the sum of $25 per week, or a total of something over $6,000 for the entire term of service. The court expressly found these allegations to be true, but limited respondent's recovery to the amount specified in the settlement agreement, namely, $1,500. In view of the legal liability of the estate, appellant is in no position to complain of the result. Nor does the fact that the trial court predicated its decision upon the written contract affect the case. The decision was right upon the facts stated, and it is not important what reasons were assigned therefor. The pleadings and evidence clearly present a case of liability on the ground of the reasonable value of the services rendered.

2. It is not fatal that the claim was not first presented to the probate court in the guardianship proceedings, for that court and the court administering the estate were the same tribunal. If there had been separate courts, a different question probably would be presented. However, we do not so decide. All we hold here is that it was unnecessary to go through the form of presenting the claim to the same court under two different labels. But it may be stated that, if the guardian had paid the claim, no doubt a presentation thereof to the probate court in connection with the settlement of his final account would have been necessary.

This covers the case and all that need be said in disposing of the same. The employment of respondent was lawful, her compensation to the extent of the reasonable value thereof was a proper charge against the estate of deceased, and the allowance thereof is sustained by the evidence, without reference to the written settlement.

Order affirmed.

Annotation—Power of guardian or committee of insane person to procure necessities for family of his ward.

Generally, as to power of guardian or committee to bind incompetent person or his estate by contract, see note to Reams v. Taylor, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436.

On use of lunatic's property to carry out his presumed wishes or to fulfil his equitable obligations as to the support of his family, see note to Potter v. Berry, 34 L.R.A. 297.

A search has revealed but few cases bearing upon the question of the power of the guardian or committee of an insane person to procure necessities for the family of his ward, besides RE MIREs, ante, 676, which holds that a guardian may, without first obtaining the approval of the probate court, employ an attendant to care for and render assistance to the invalid wife of his ward.

In Lake v. Hope (1914) 116 Va. 687, 82 S. E. 738, under a statute providing that the committee of an insane person shall apply his personal estate, or so much as may be necessary, to the payment of his debts, and the rents and profits of the residue of his estate, real and personal, and the residue of the personal estate, or so much as may be necessary, to the maintenance of such insane person and of his family, it was held that a committee may use, when necessary, the corpus of the personal estate in the support and maintenance of the ward and his family, without first obtaining the sanction of the court L.R.A.1917B.

having jurisdiction over the ward's estate.

In Deming v. Paynter (1897) 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1123, 42 S. W. 1112, it was held that it was proper for the committee of a lunatic to incur more expense for the care and comfort of the ward and his wife than would be necessary for persons in good health.

In Citizens' State Bank v. Shanklin (1913) 174 Mo. App. 639, 161 S. W. 341, it is stated that the guardian of an insane person is entitled, upon his accounting, to credit for all proper expenditures for necessities for the latter's family.

In Re Stewart (1891) — N. J. Eq. —, 22 Atl. 122, it was held that a guardian was entitled to reimbursement from the proceeds of the sale of his ward's realty, for the funeral expenses of the latter's wife, although she made provision by her will for their payment from her separate estate.

But in Pearl v. M'Dowell (1830) 3 J. J. Marsh (Ky.) 658, 20 Am. Dec. 199, it was held that the committee of a lunatic had no power to bind him by a contract to pay for medical and surgical services to be rendered to the lunatic's wife. In this case it is stated, however, that the committee of such a person ought, at least as far as the profits of the estate would justify it, to engage medical or surgical aid for the wife, if necessary.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

The following will serve as a brief outline of the allegations in plaintiff's complaint:

Headnote by TAYLOR, C.

Note. — The question whether an action for alienation of affections may rest upon a breach of contract or negligent tort is discussed in the annotation following this case, post, 680.

That defendants operated a detective agency in the city of Minneapolis, doing a general detective business for hire, and held themselves out to the public as skilful in such business and in obtaining private information; that plaintiff employed them to obtain definite and certain information regarding the actions and habits of his wife and the places where she spent her time when away from home; that defendants agreed to investigate and secure the desired information; that plaintiff gave defendant a full and accurate description of his wife, together with her name and place of residence; that through negligence and carelessness defendants, instead of shadowing plaintiff's wife and securing information as to her actions, whereabouts, and general conduct, shadowed another woman who was unknown to plaintiff, and reported her conduct to plaintiff as the conduct of his wife; that in consequence thereof defendants falsely reported that plaintiff's wife kept company with other men and conducted herself in an immoral manner; that, relying upon the truth of such reports, plaintiff charged his wife with misconduct; that his wife, being wholly innocent of any misconduct, abandoned him, and has ever since refused to live with or return to him; and that his home has been broken up and his wife's affections forever alienated. The complaint also alleged the amount paid defendant for its services, and demanded damages in a large amount for the alienation of his wife's affections. At the opening of the trial plaintiff expressly waived the right to recover back the sum paid for services, and rested his case solely upon the proposition that he was entitled to recover general damages for the alienation of his wife's affections. Thereupon the court sustained an objection to the reception of any evidence under the complaint and dismissed the suit on the ground that the complaint, as modified by the express waiver, failed to state a cause of action. Plaintiff appealed from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The question presented is whether, upon the facts stated in the complaint, plaintiff is entitled to recover from defendant for the alienation of his wife's affections. To determine this question, we must consider and apply the rules of law governing that class of actions.

It is well settled that either husband or wife, in order to recover damages from a third party for alienating the affections of the other, must show that such third party took an active and intentional part in causing the estrangement. Powers v. Sumblor, 83 Kan. 1, 110 Pac. 97; Nevins v. Nevins, 68 Kan. 410, 75 Pac. 492; Rinehart v. Bills, 82 Mo. 534, 52 Am. Rep. 385; Scott v.

C.) 45 Fed. 315; Heisler v. Heisler, — Iowa, —, 127 N. W. 823; 1 Bishop, Marr. & Div., § 1861; 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 468; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 43; 3 Elliott, Ev. §§ 1643, 1646; 1 Enc. Forms, p. 684, Nos. 1097, 1098. See also Busenbark v. Busenbark, 150 Iowa, 7, 129 N. W. 332; Lockwood v. Lockwood, 67 Minn. 476, 70 N. W. 784; Kroessin v. Keller, 60 Minn. 372, 27 L.R.A. 685, 51 Am. St. Rep. 533, 62 N. W. 438; Cornelius v. Cornelius, 233 Mo. 1, 135 S. W. 65.

According to the authorities, liability is imposed upon an intermeddler where he purposely and unjustifiably induces either husband or wife to abandon the other, but is not imposed upon him unless, by acts knowingly and intentionally committed for that purpose, he was the procuring cause of the separation. To incur liability, he must have been instrumental in causing the estrangement by knowingly, if not maliciously, exerting a baneful influence upon the spouse who renounced the marital obligations. We have found no case based upon negligence only in which damages for alienation of affections have been awarded. The Iowa court remarks: "The action is for an intentional, not merely a negligible, tort;" the Kansas court states that plaintiff must show "that the acts of the defendant were done knowingly and intentionally, for the purpose of alienating the husband's affections."

In the present case plaintiff grounds his action wholly upon the claim that defendant was negligent in the performance of duties which plaintiff employed it to perform. No claim is made that defendant ever communicated with the wife in any manner, or caused any information to be given to her. Whether we assume that she left plaintiff on account of the charges which he made against her in consequence of the erroneous information furnished by defendant, or on account of his conduct in engaging detectives to watch her, the facts stated in the complaint are insufficient to establish a cause of action for the alienation of her affections.

Order affirmed.

Annotation—May action for alienation of affections rest upon a breach of contract or negligent tort.

LILLIGREN v. WILLIAM J. BURNS INTERNATIONAL DETECTIVE AGENCY, ante, 679, seems to be a case of first impression as to right to predicate an action for alienation of affections solely upon the negligence of, or breach of contract by, defendant. The decision in that case, that such an action cannot be maintained upon the facts alleged and proved, is in harmony with the rule that malice is an essential ingredient to such an action.

As to malice as essential to an action for alienation of affections in the absence of meretricious relations, see Geromini v. Brunelli, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 465.

A case sufficiently analogous to be included in this note is Work v. Campbell (1912) 164 Cal. 343, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 581, 128 Pac. 943, which held that where a woman may sue for damages for enticing her husband from her, she may maintain an action for deceit in making false representations to her about her husband, which caused her to treat him cruelly and thereby drive him from her, where her treatment would have been justified if the representations had been true.

It is to be observed that in the Work L.R.A.1917B.

Case, the false representations were knowingly made; so that case would probably not be authority for an action for deceit predicated upon facts similar to those in the LILLIGREN CASE.

Although not within the scope of this note, attention is called to Nieberg v. Cohen (1914) 88 Vt. 281, L.R.A.1915C, 483, 92 Atl. 214, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 476, which held that a wife cannot, either at common law or under the married woman's act giving her a right to hold separate property and sue alone, recover damages for loss of companionship and support from persons who successfully conspired to induce her husband to commit an offense for which he was imprisoned, where they intended to injure him, and not her.

But see, however, Flandermeyer v. Cooper (1912) 85 Ohio St. 327, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 360, 98 N. E. 102, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 983, which held that one who, with knowledge that a husband, by the constant and continued use of morphine, had become so weakened in body and mind that he was unable to resist his craving for the drug, and who, after repeated protests from the wife, continued to sell morphine to the husband until, by the use thereof, his mind became so impaired that it was necessary to confine him in an insane asylum, is liable to the wife for damages for her loss of consortium.

The court held in the Flandermeyer Case that malice is implied in an action by a wife for the loss of consortium of her husband, resulting from the sale of morphine to the husband by the defendant, and it is not necessary that hatred, ill will, or actual malice be shown, nor that the act proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition.

v.

W. H. RAGAN, Admr., etc., of W. W. Hinshaw, Deceased, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 90 S. E. 777.)

Contract — implied — to pay for services of illegal wife.

A woman deceived into marriage with a man having a wife living may recover from his estate the value of the services rendered by her to him as upon implied contract.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Guilford County in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover for services rendered and for money lent to defendant's intestate while plaintiff was living with him, under the belief that she was his lawful wife. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

The allegations and proof on the part of plaintiff tended to show that on or about September 20, 1913, she was induced to go through the forms of marriage with defendant's intestate, and lived with him as his wife, fully believing she was such, till the date of his death in February, 1915, when she ascertained that during all the time intestate had a lawful wife still living, resident elsewhere; that during said period and association plaintiff advanced him $200 in money, to be used in building a home, and, in addition, had rendered him various services of value, in waiting on him in his last sickness, etc., and that said money, etc., was reasonably worth $680.

There was denial of liability on the part of defendant, and, on general issue of indebtedness, the court submitted to the jury the question of money advanced and the amount of the same, and in reference to the claim for work and labor charged the jury, among other things, in substance, that plaintiff could not recover if she had knowingly and voluntarily lived in illicit relationship with defendant during said time, and further, that if "plaintiff went through the form of marriage with W. W. Hinshaw, deceased, honestly believing she was marrying him, he knowing that he had a living wife and therefore could not marry, if she went into his house under those circumstances and resided with him in the apparent relationship of husband and wife, and she served him, labored for him, and those services and those labors had a value to him, that it turned out afterwards that she was not his wife, could make no claim upon his representative or his estate after his death, that in such case the law would raise for her benefit an implied promise to pay her for what the jury might find her services to be reasonably worth over and above, that is, in excess of, what benefits by way of food and clothing and keep and maintenance she received from him, if any you should find."

Note. — As to right to recover for household services rendered while parties were living in illicit relations, see annotation following this case, post, 683.

There was a verdict for plaintiff for $422. Judgment on verdict, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Messrs. Roberson, Barnhart, & Smith and King & Kimball, for appellant:

Plaintiff cannot recover either for services rendered or for money loaned, as her claim grows out of and is so closely connected with the illegal association of himself and defendant's intestate.

Even if plaintiff, in good faith, believed that she was married to the intestate, still she could not recover for alleged services, as there is no evidence tending to show any express or implied promise, on the part of the intestate, to pay, nor is there any evidence that the plaintiff expected to receive compensation for such services.

Mr. Clifford Frazier for appellee.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is conflict of authority on the question presented in this appeal, but we are of opinion that the decisions in support of plaintiff's claim have the better reason, and that the judgment in her favor should be affirmed. True, the position is fully recognized in this jurisdiction that no recovery can be had for services rendered when they are given and received without expectation of pay. Richmond Guano Co. v. Bennett, 170 N. C. 345, 87 S. E. 102, citing Winkler v. Killiam, 141 N. C. 578, 115 Am. St. Rep. 694, 54 S. E. 540, and Prince v. McRae, 84 N. C. 675, but the principle should have no application to this record, where, on the facts as accepted by the jury, the plaintiff, being without default, has rendered services of value in ignorance of the essential relevant facts, and was induced thereto by the fraud and wrong of the intestate. In such case we think that the general equitable principles of indebitatus assumpsit should apply, and the cases which so hold should be approved as controlling. Fox v. Dawson, 8 Mart. (La.) 94; Higgins v. Breen, 9 Mo. 497; Hickam v. Hickam, 46 Mo. App. 496; Boardman v. Ward, 40 Minn. 399, 12 Am. St. Rep. 749, 42 N. W. 202; Keener, Quasi Contr. p. 318.

Two of the cases opposing this position, Franklin v. Waters, 8 Gill, 322, and Cooper v. Cooper, 147 Mass. 370, 9 Am. St. Rep. 721, 17 N. E. 892, and cited in several text-writers of recognized merit as upholding the better view, have been subjected to intelligent criticism in Mr. Keener's work, and the decisions rendered in these cases are expressly disapproved. Keener, Quasi Contr. pp. 321-325.

Speaking to the decision in Franklin v. Waters, a case where a slave, who had been freed by the will of his former owner, was kept in ignorance of the fact, and thereby made to serve for some length of time as a slave by the heir and successor of the testator, and recovery on a quantum meruit was denied, the author says: "The reason why a man who does not intend to charge for services rendered is not allowed to recover compensation therefor is because the gift of a thing is inconsistent with a sale or barter thereof, and therefore one to whom a thing has been given is not doing anything inequitable in refusing to pay therefor. The principle therefore clearly has no application to a case where the plaintiff has been induced by fraud to give services to the defendant, which the defendant knew he had no right to claim, and which he also knew would not have been rendered but for the belief of the plaintiff in the defendant's right thereto."

And in reference to Cooper v. Cooper, supra, a case as to a claim for services exactly similar to the one before us, in which a recovery was also denied, on a quantum meruit, the court holding that plaintiff's remedy should have been in tort for the deceit, it is said, among other things: "It is submitted with all deference that a different result should have been reached in this case. It is true that the intestate's accepting the plaintiff's services was an incident of a previous wrong, and not an independent tort. But it is also true that the intestate, by accepting the services, wrongfully enriched himself at the plaintiff's expense; and while, if he had received nothing of value from the plaintiff, the plaintiff could only have sued for breach of promise to marry, or in tort for deceit, yet it is submitted that, when he, because of his tort, enriched himself, the plaintiff, if she saw fit to sue, not for damages, but simply for compensation to the extent that the defendant had profited by his wrong, should have been allowed to do so."

And speaking further to this decision: "If, instead of receiving the services of the plaintiff, the defendant had, in the exercise of his supposed common-law marital rights, reduced to possession choses in action belonging to the plaintiff, it hardly seems possible that a court would hold that, as the right to sue in tort had been lost by the death of the intestate, the plaintiff could not recover against his estate the money received in extinguishment of choses in action, which in fact belonged to the plaintiff, and which the defendant unlawfully appropriated to his own use. Had the plaintiff in this case surrendered to the defendant money or other chattels to which the defendant asserted a right because of his marital rights as husband, it does not seem possible that a court would hold that, because of the loss of the right to sue in tort by the death of the intestate, no claim could be asserted against his estate for the value so received by him. And yet, in point of principal, it is submitted that it is impossible to distinguish between the receipt of money or other property by the defendant and the receipt of services. The plaintiff, whether she conferred a benefit on the intestate by rendering services or by delivering him money or other personal property, in either case parted with a right in rem under a mistaken supposition, induced by the fraud of the defendant, that the defendant was entitled thereto,"—a line of reasoning which gives full support to plaintiff's right to recover for money advanced in the principal case, and, to our minds, equally sustains her recovery for services rendered and received by intestate to his pecuniary advantage. The action of indebitatus assumpsit, as stated, is dependent largely on equitable principles (Mitchell v. Walker, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 243); and, in the absence of a special contract controlling the matter, and unless in contravention of some public policy, it will usually lie where even one man has been enriched or his estate enhanced at another's expense under circumstances that in equity and good conscience call for an accounting by the wrongdoer.

Our decisions uphold recoveries when money not justly due has been paid under a mistake of fact. Simms v. Vick, 151 N. C. 78, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 517, 65 S. E. 621, 18 Ann. Cas. 669. When a man's property has been wrongfully converted or obtained by fraud or deceit, the owner is allowed to waive the tort and sue in contract (Stroud v. Life Ins. Co. 148 N. C. 54, 61 S. E. 626; White v. Boyd, 124 N. C. 177, 32 S. E. 495); and we see no reason for withholding the application of the principle from the present case, where it is established that valuable services were rendered and received, and plaintiff was induced thereto by the wrong and fraud of defendant.

There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Right to recover for household services rendered while parties were living in illicit relations.

The earlier cases on this question are discussed in the annotation to Emmer-son v. Botkin, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 786.

As to right to recover what has been paid or transferred in consideration of illicit relations, see annotation to Lanham v. Meadows, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 592.

As appears from the prior annotation, a conflict exists on the question whether a woman who is deceived in her belief that she is lawfully married may recover for household services performed while living with her supposed husband. It will be noted that the court in SANDERS v. RAGAN, ante, 681, held that a recovery might be had under such circumstances, it appearing that the plaintiff was ignorant, until the death of the one to whom she supposed that she had been legally married, that he had a lawful wife living.

The only case on the question under consideration which appears to have been L.R.A.1917B.

decided since the prior annotation involved the right of a man to recover from a woman with whom he had lived in illicit relations, for work and services. In this case, Gjurich v. Fieg (1912) 164 Cal. 429, 129 Pac. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111, there was testimony for the defendant that, pursuant to advice of the plaintiff, she purchased property and established a roadhouse and saloon on it; that she and the plaintiff lived there for ten years, during which time the plaintiff worked on the place; that from the outset the parties lived together as husband and wife, although never married; that the relations commenced and continued without any specific agreement for the payment of wages by the defendant to the plaintiff; that she gave him money from time to time to purchase articles, and that he retained what he desired for his own use. The evidence in the case was held sufficient to sustain a verdict for the defendant, although in many particulars the plaintiff's evidence was in conflict with the defendant's.

It was also held in this case that although ordinarily the law will imply a promise to pay for services rendered and accepted, this is founded on a mere presumption of law, and is liable to be rebutted by proof of a special agreement to pay therefor, or that the services were intended to be gratuitous, or by particular circumstances from which the law will raise a counter presumption that the services were not intended to be a charge against the party who was benefited by them; and it was held that the relation existing between the parties in the case at bar, although meretricious, might be considered as illustrating the purpose and expectation with which work was done by each, and that the defendant was properly allowed to testify concerning her relations with the plaintiff, and that there was no error in permitting the plaintiff to be cross-examined as to such relations, he having testified on direct examination to circumstances from which an obligation to pay for his services might be implied.

And an instruction was held not improper which referred to the case of a son working for a father, or a woman for a supposed husband, as they were mere illustrations of some of the circumstances which would justify an inference that services had been rendered gratuitously, and were appropriate as aids to the jury in determining whether compensation was expected in the case at bar.

And where the defendant's contention was merely that her relations with the plaintiff were to be considered in determining whether a claim for wages had ever existed, it was held that the court properly refused to charge that sexual intercourse would not constitute payment of plaintiff's claim for wages. #### OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OHIO EX REL. EMERY LAT-TANNER, Deputy Superintendent of Banks, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FRANK A. HILLS.

Bills and notes — consideration — bank examination.

1. Where a note is executed to a bank for the purpose of meeting the requirement of the state superintendent of banks that deficiency of the assets of said bank be made good, and for the purpose and with the result of enabling such bank to continue its business for some period, during which debts are created and new depositors acquired, neither the defense of want of consideration nor failure of consideration for such note is available in an action brought to recover thereon by the state superintendent of banks.

For other cases, see Bills and Notes, VI. o, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Headnotes by the Court.

Note. — As to consideration for note or other obligation given to make good depletion of capital or assets of bank, see annotation following this case, post, 688.

Same — duress.

2. However, the defense of duress is available to the maker of such note, and if the execution thereof was induced solely by threats of criminal prosecution of a brother of the defendant, made for that purpose by officers of the payee bank and a representative of the state superintendent of banks, and under such circumstances as to constitute a reasonable and adequate cause to control the will of the maker of said note, he may be relieved from payment thereof.

For other cases, see Duress, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — disregarding issues.

3. Where, upon the issues made by several defenses to a claim sued upon, a general verdict is found for the defendant, it not being disclosed by answers to interrogatories or otherwise upon which issue the verdict was based, and the record disclosing no error touching either the presentation or submission of at least one of such issues, a finding upon which in favor of the prevailing party would justify a general judgment, which is rendered, error of the trial court in the submission of other issues will be disregarded.

(April 25, 1916.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Delaware County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by the Court:

The original petition filed by the relator, Emery Lattanner, deputy supervisor of banks, was for the recovery of $2,000 and interest upon a promissory note of which the following is a copy:

$2,000. Gambier, Ohio, Feb. 1, 1910.

On or before three years after date I promise to pay the Gambier Banking Co. or order two thousand <sup>no</sup>/<sub>100</sub> dollars for value received, payable at the office of said company, with interest at 3 per cent per annum, having deposited as collateral security for the payment of this note as stated on back hereof.

And I hereby give to the holder hereof full power and authority to sell or collect at my expense all or any part or portion thereof, at any place, either in Ohio or elsewhere, at public or private sale, at holder's option, on the nonperformance of the above promise and at any time thereafter, and without advertising the same or otherwise giving to me any notice. In case of public sale, the holder may purchase without being liable to account for more than the net proceeds of such sale.

And it is also agreed that the holder or assigns may also hold said property as security for or out of the proceeds thereof may pay any other claims the holder may have against me while said property or the proceeds thereof remain in holder's hands.

Collateral note No. 6949.

Frank A. Hills.

On the back of the note are the following credits and indorsements:

"For the protection of the maker of this note the Gambier Banking Company deposits the one-twentieth part of the following securities: 9,988 shares Pref'd—32,488 shares common stock of the Cashier Mining & Milling Co.—1,950 shrs., Pref'd stock of the Oppenheimer Institute. Equity in 1,300-acre farm in Pike county, Ohio, and $10,000 policy No. 57,612 in the Berkshire Life Insurance Company. In the event that these securities realize more than the face value of this note and interest due, the balance shall be the property of the said banking company.

By an amendment to the petition it is averred that the collateral mentioned on the back of the note, and which came into plaintiff's possession, was sold for the highest price obtainable, the total amount realized therefrom being $5,774.34, which entitles defendant to a credit on the note in the sum of $288.87.

The defendant, by his amended answer, after admitting the execution of the note sued upon and denying other averments of the petition, set up further defenses, in substance as follows: Second, that there was no consideration for the execution of said note; third, that it was executed for the purpose of being held by said bank as a pretended asset to meet the requirement of the state superintendent of banks that the assets of said bank be replenished; that it was expressly understood and agreed that there would be no obligation upon the defendant to pay said note, and that the only purpose on the part of the superintendent of banks was to lead the creditors of said bank and the general public to believe that said note was a valuable asset of the bank; fourth, that said note was signed under duress, the defendant being induced to execute the same by threats of officers of said bank and the state superintendent of banks that his brother, a former official of the bank, would be criminally prosecuted unless the defendant executed said note; fifth, that said note was paid by subsequent cash contribution to the assets of said bank by the brother and brother-in-law of the defendant, and that it was understood and agreed that said payment constituted a settlement of said note as well as all notes theretofore given by said brother and brother-in-law of the defendant; sixth, that there was a failure of consideration for said note, in that said bank was not permitted to continue in business for a period of three years, and criminal prosecution was caused to be instituted against defendant's brother, contrary to an agreement made and in consideration of which said note was executed.

The court of common pleas having overruled a demurrer to the answer and each defense set forth therein, the plaintiff filed a reply which, in addition to admitting certain allegations and denying others, averred that by reason of the execution of the note said bank was permitted to continue until May 16, 1911, and that after the delivery of the note a large amount of deposits were received from persons who are now unpaid creditors of said banking company; that said note was listed among the assets of said banking company, and that the defendant is estopped to deny the validity thereof or his liability thereon as against plaintiff.

The case was submitted to a jury, which returned a general verdict in favor of the defendant, upon which the court of common pleas rendered judgment, which judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals. Error is now prosecuted to this court and a reversal sought.

Messrs. Edward T. Powell and John M. Elliott for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Marriott, Freshwater, & Wickham for defendant in error.

Matthias, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The substance of the pleadings heretofore stated sufficiently shows the issues upon which the case went to trial. The controlling facts may readily be gleaned from the record, and there is little conflict or dispute in the evidence.

Harry N. Hills, a brother of the defendant in this action, in the year 1900 opened a private bank in Gambier, Ohio, known as the Gambier Savings Bank, and as the president and general manager continued such business about five years. During that period he had borrowed large sums of money from the bank, executing his individual notes and pledging as collateral security therefor his equity in a Pike county farm, shares of stock of the Cashier Mining & Milling Company and the Oppenheimer Institute, and also a life insurance policy upon his own life in the sum of $10,000.

In 1905 the Gambier Banking Company was organized under the laws of the state, and took over all the assets of the Gambier Savings Bank. Harry N. Hills then ceased to have any connection with the bank except as a debtor; the successor bank having among its assets the notes of Harry N. Hills and the property heretofore referred to as collateral security.

In the year 1909 the state superintendent of banks ascertained that the Gambier Banking Company had not assets sufficient to meet its obligations, and that it was in an unsafe and unsound condition to transact the business for which it was organized. Under authority of § 730, General Code, he required the bank to make good such deficiency in its assets or suffer its doors to be closed and its business liquidated. In accordance with the requirement of the superintendent of banks, the officers of the Gambier Banking Company raised the sum of $25,000 as additional assets of the bank, included in which was the note for $2,000 executed by the defendant, sued upon herein, a note for $3,500 executed by Frederick P. Hills, another brother, and a note for $2,000 executed by Dr. G. N. Ferris, a brother-in-law of said Harry N. Hills. At the time of the execution of these notes the property which had been assigned to the bank by Harry N. Hills and carried by the bank as assets was no longer carried as assets of the bank, the notes being substituted therefor, and the property, in accordance with the condition indorsed on the notes, was deposited for the protection L.R.A.1917B.

of the makers thereof. The bank was permitted to continue its business, but later a demand was made by the superintendent of banks for a further increase in the assets of the bank, in response to which $27,741.69 additional assets were raised in September, 1910, of which $11,741.69 was furnished by Frederick P. Hills and Dr. G. N. Ferris, the defendant, Frank A. Hills, having refused to contribute anything thereto. The Gambier Banking Company was permitted to continue its business until May, 1911, when the state superintendent of banks found it necessary to take possession thereof for the purpose of liquidation. Among the assets which came into the hands of the superintendent of banks was the note of the defendant, Frank A. Hills, herein sued upon.

At the close of the evidence counsel for plaintiff below, plaintiff in error here, moved the court for a directed verdict against the defendant, and also asked for specific instruction to the jury to disregard the claims made by the several defenses set up in the amended answer. These several motions were overruled, the case was submitted to the jury, and a general verdict rendered for the defendant. The action of the court in overruling the motions, and also in refusing to instruct the jury upon the issue of estoppel made by the reply, is urged as prejudicial error for which the judgment should be reversed by this court.

In our opinion, the trial court might properly have stated to the jury that, under the facts disclosed by the record, the defenses of want of consideration and failure of consideration were not available to the defendant. However, the court did instruct the jury in substance that if they found from the evidence that, at the time the note sued upon was made, the bank was in a failing condition, and that the note was executed for the purpose and with the result of enabling the bank to continue its business for some period, that would constitute a sufficient consideration for the note, and that the closing of the bank subsequently because of further impairment of its assets would not constitute a failure of consideration of said note. The jury could not have understood this instruction otherwise than as a direction not to consider the defenses of want of and failure of consideration, set up in the amended answer. By such instruction, therefore, the trial court did in fact sustain the motion of counsel in such respect, and properly took from the jury the consideration of the defenses indicated.

It clearly appears from the record that by reason of the execution of the note sued upon, and others which went to make up the required amount of additional assets, the bank was permitted to continue business for a period during which further credits and deposits were acquired, and it would therefore be entirely inequitable to permit the defendant to avert liability on his note on the ground that there was a want or failure of consideration for said note, nor was the defense available that officers of the bank represented that such note would be treated as assets only for the purpose of misleading the public. No evidence was offered tending to support such claim, and, even if it had been, it would have been clearly incompetent. Beecher v. Dunlap, 52 Ohio St. 64, 38 N. E. 795.

We are also in accord with the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error that there was no evidence warranting the trial court in submitting to the jury an issue of payment. The defendant pleaded the payment of $11,741.69 into the assets of the bank by Frederick P. Hills and Dr. G. N. Ferris, as a settlement of his note, and that question was submitted to the jury in the face of the statement made by the defendant himself that "he refused to contribute anything to that end," and the undisputed evidence that no reference whatever was made to the note of the defendant, directly or indirectly, either in the conversation at the time such sum was furnished by Frederick P. Hills and Dr. G. N. Ferris or in the receipt then given. Frederick P. Hills, who now claims to have then represented his brother, the defendant, testified that when that sum was paid no reference whatever was made to the note of the latter, and there is no evidence that the note of the defendant entered into the second transaction.

The trial court might well have followed the admonition of the judge announcing the opinion in the case of Cincinnati Gas & E. Co. v. Archdeacon, 80 Ohio St. 27, 88 N. E. 125, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 251, who there said: "It is subversive of the public interests and promotive of no right of either party to continue a contest before a jury when nothing is involved but the application of the law to a state of facts conclusively established."

However, the defense of duress is available to the defendant, and as against that defense there are no facts warranting the imposition of the principle of estoppel. It clearly appears from the record that neither the defendant nor his brother, Frederick P. Hills, nor his brother-in-law, Dr. G. N. Ferris, prior to or at the time such notes were executed, had any relation whatever to the bank, either as officer, director, or stockholder, and that neither of them was a debtor or creditor of the bank, and that L.R.A.1917B.

neither would be affected financially if the bank were closed by order of the state superintendent of banks and its business liquidated. The only motive apparent, therefore, for the giving of their notes, was to avert the threatened criminal prosecution of Harry N. Hills. There is evidence that the president, vice president, and cashier of the bank, in their endeavor to procure the execution of these notes, had impressed upon the brother and brother-in-law of Harry N. Hills the very grave danger confronting him, and on several occasions had said to Frederick P. Hills that if the notes were not furnished the bank would be closed, and Harry N. Hills, the brother, would be prosecuted for a criminal offense, and it further appears that additional force was given these statements by clear intimations of similar consequences made by examiners of the banking department. It further appears from the record that these representations and threats were communicated by Frederick P. Hills to his brother, the defendant, and there is evidence in the record that by means of such threats the defendant was coerced into signing the note, and that but for such representations and threats he would not have executed the note now sued upon. The evidence further indicates that such threats were made under such circumstances as to constitute a reasonable and adequate cause to control the will of the defendant, and that it was intended that they should be communicated to and influence the action of the defendant and induce the execution of the note. It was therefore competent to show that they were in fact communicated to the defendant, and also to show what, if any, effect they had in inducing the defendant to sign the note. Objection made to such evidence was therefore properly overruled. Fountain v. Bigham, 235 Pa. 35, 84 Atl. 131, Ann. Cas. 1013D, 1185; Henry v. State Bank, 131 Iowa, 97, 107 N. W. 1034, and Sharon v. Gager, 46 Conn. 189.

In our opinion, the evidence disclosed by the record justified the submission of but one issue to the jury, that of duress; and the record does not disclose any error either in the admission or rejection of evidence touching the issue of duress, or in the submission of that issue to the jury.

The verdict returned by the jury is a general verdict. No request for a special verdict was made, and no interrogatories submitted; hence it is not disclosed upon which defense the verdict was based. If any presumption is to be indulged, it would be that the verdict is not based upon defenses which were not supported by any evidence whatever. The rule laid down in Sites v. Haverstick, 23 Ohio St. 626, approved and followed in Beecher v. Dunlap, supra, and McAllister v. Hartzell, 60 Ohio St. 69, 53 N. E. 715, clearly applies and requires an affirmation of the judgment. Applying that rule to the instant case, we hold that where, upon the issues made by several defenses to a claim sued upon, a general verdict is found for the defendant, it not being disclosed by answers to interrogatories or otherwise upon which issue the verdict was based, and the record disclosing no error touching either the presentation or submission of at least one of such issues, a finding upon which in favor of the prevailing party would justify a general judgment, which is rendered, error of the trial court in the submission of other issues will be disregarded.

Judgment affirmed.

Nichols, Ch. J., and Johnson, Donahue, Newman, and Jones, JJ., concur.

Annotation—Consideration for note or other obligation given to make good depletion of capital or assets of bank.

Not many cases have arisen in which the consideration for a note given a bank to make good a depletion in assets or capital is considered apart from other elements. For example, a note may be given to conceal such depletion. This question, so far as illegal transactions are concerned, has been treated in the notes to Galena Nat. Bank v. Ripley, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 993; Lyons v. Benney, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 105; and Skagit State Bank v. Moody, L.R.A.1916A, 1218. It is, of course, apparent that the note does not include cases in which a note is given to the bank to protect it against loss on a particular obligation, by agreement with the debtor in such obligation, so as to extend time for the payment thereof, or effect any change in the rights of the bank with reference thereto. In many instances notes are given under an agreement that they are not to be collected, but are to be paid out of profits. The effect of such an agreement, except as it may bear upon the consideration, is not considered herein.

As above stated, the cases passing upon the question under annotation are not numerous. The view is sometimes taken that even if there be no consideration for such an obligation, the maker is estopped to plead the defense of lack of consideration. The cases which have dealt with the question have, for the most part, involved notes given by persons financially interested in the bank. Such cases support the theory that the note is upon a sufficient consideration.

Thus, a note given to the bank by the president, and indorsed by members of the executive committee, all of whom are directors and stockholders in the bank, to take the place of worthless paper which had been carried upon the books of the bank for some time, rather than charge the amount thereof to the apparent surplus, and thus reduce the assets of the bank, was held upon a L.R.A.1917B.

sufficient consideration in Union Bank v. Sullivan (1915) 214 N. Y. 332, 108 N. E. 558. A factor in causing the execution of the note was that, if the loss was charged off the assets of the bank, it would result in a fall in the value of the bank's stock; and the court states that the prevention in the fall of the stock which was held by those who became liable on the note was a distinct benefit to them and constituted a sufficient consideration. The court, in conclusion of the foregoing discussion of consideration, states that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon the question of consideration. The meaning is not altogether clear, but apparently is, not that the ultimate question of whether or not there is a consideration is for the jury, but that the determination of the facts upon which the consideration rests is for the jury.

It is held in Sickles v. Herold (1895) 11 Misc. 583, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1083, that a note given by the director of a bank to make good an impairment of its assets and thereby prevent the closing of the bank by the state bank department is upon a sufficient consideration where the bank was thereupon allowed to continue in business. The court states that even if the note were without consideration, the defendant would be estopped to allege the defense. That the director is estopped to allege such a defense is the opinion of the court upon what appears to be a second appeal of this case, reported in (1895) 15 Misc. 116, 36 N. Y. Supp. 488. This second appeal is affirmed without opinion on this point in (1896) 149 N. Y. 332, 43 N. E. 852. The action was by the receiver of the bank, upon the note.

A note executed and indorsed by the individual members of the board of directors of a bank, to make good an impairment of capital resulting upon the charging off of bad loans, with the understanding that it was to be paid out of profits, is upon a consideration sufficient to entitle a receiver of the bank, subsequently appointed, to recover thereon. State Bank v. Kirk (1907) 216 Pa. 452, 65 Atl. 932. The theory of this case apparently is that the makers of the note are estopped to plead the defense of want of consideration.

Notes given by the directors of a bank to the bank, upon some doubt arising as to its solvency for the purpose of making the bank unquestionably solvent, are stated in Dykman v. Keeney (1896) 10 App. Div. 610, 42 N. Y. Supp. 488, to have been supported by a sufficient consideration. The court states that "the defendants were directors and stockholders in the bank. It was to their interest and direct benefit that the bank should be permitted to continue to carry on and transact its business. This it could do only by making good any impairment existing in its capital. . . . While the question whether the capital was impaired at the time the notes were given was not determined, nor did the superintendent of the banking department make any requisition upon the directors to make good any specific deficiency, still the doubt existing on that question in the mind of the superintendent, arising out of the character of some of the debts and bills receivable due to the bank, and the interest of the directors in the continuance of the bank as a sound financial and business institution, constituted a sufficient consideration to support the notes of the defendants, given to make good any possible deficiency which did exist."

There was no direct question as to the consideration for the notes in this case, however, they having been paid prior to the action; the question being whether they constituted assets of the bank. Upon a second appeal of this case, reported in (1897) 16 App. Div. 131, 45 N. Y. Supp. 137, the court does not consider the question of consideration, but states simply that, the notes having been paid, the receiver should be held estopped from questioning their existence as an asset. Judgment upon the second appeal was affirmed by the court of appeals in (1899) 160 N. Y. 677, 54 N. E. 1090, without opinion.

A note given by the cashier (who was also a stockholder) of a bank as his contribution toward making good a loss which the bank had suffered through money being stolen out of the vaults, of which he had custody and control, is upon a consideration sufficient to entitle the bank to recover thereon. Utah Nat. Bank v. Nelson (1910) 38 Utah, 169, 111 Pac. 907. Upon discovery of the loss, the cashier and president determined that it was necessary to make the loss good; the president agreed to put up a certain amount, and insisted that the cashier put up the amount called for in the note. Upon a dispute arising as to whether he should put up that amount, the matter was submitted to the vice president, who determined that the amount was correct, whereupon the note was executed. It thus appears that the note was executed as a mutual promise to contribute toward a common cause, and this is stated by the court to have been a consideration for the same also.

An action by the receiver of a savings bank upon a mortgage given by a trustee of the bank to a third person, and by such third person assigned to the bank for the purpose of making good a deficit in the assets of the bank, cannot be defeated on the ground that there was no consideration for the instrument. Best v. Thiel (1879) 79 N. Y. 15. This decision is based upon two grounds: First, that the mortgage was under seal, which was presumptive evidence of a consideration,—a presumption that was not clearly overcome. Second, that the defendant was estopped from denying the legal validity of the mortgage. Upon the evidence that was given to overcome the presumption of consideration arising from the sealed instrument, it is stated that the "defendant was one of the trustees of the bank, and there was a claim that he was personally liable for the deficiency. The bank superintendent informed the trustees that they were all so liable, and that unless they made up this deficiency their individual liability would be enforced. It was upon this requisition of the superintendent that the mortgage was given, and, if given to discharge a personal liability, it was not without consideration." It is further stated that it is true there was no finding that there was such personal liability for the deficiency, neither was there a finding that there was none; the claim of liability was made by one in authority, and the court adds that it is sufficient to say that the presumption of a consideration was not clearly overcome.

In Skordal v. Stanton (1903) 89 Minn. 511, 95 N. W. 449, the director of a bank had made and delivered his promissory note to the bank to cover the amount of impaired capital; thereafter the bank became insolvent and the receiver brought an action upon the note and recovered judgment. This judgment was paid, and thereupon the maker filed his petition in the insolvency proceedings for leave to file his claim against the bank for the amount so paid by him. The director had raised the question of consideration for the note in the action by the receiver against him in which the judgment had been obtained, and the court states that the judgment in that action disposed of the defense which he had interposed, but adds that "even if this were not true, it is very evident from the facts appearing that Skordal has no claim upon funds in the hands of the receiver as against general creditors; the assets of the bank had become impaired, and, with other directors, he executed and delivered the note to make good the deficiency; he did this in order that the bank might keep its doors open and go on with its business. The bank continued to deal with depositors and others, all parties relying undoubtedly upon this, among other securities, and when the assets are being collected for the purpose of meeting its obligations Skordal cannot be heard to deny the validity of his note; as to creditors, he is estopped from asserting this defense."

A note given by the directors of a bank upon the demand of the state bank examiner, to make good the impairment of the capital of the bank, was held to be upon a sufficient consideration, in Interstate Trust & Bkg. Co. v. Irwin (1915) 138 La. 325, 70 So. 313. It does not appear whether or not the bank was the payee of the note. The note was discounted at another bank, and the proceeds put to the credit of the bank for whose benefit it was given. It is apparent that there would be additional elements to constitute a consideration in case of a note given to a third person, who advances money thereon.

It will be noticed that the defendant in STATE EX REL. LATTANNER v. HILLS, ante, 684, was, so far as appears from the report, not financially interested in the bank. Whether there is a consideration for a note given by one not interested raises a different question from that presented in the foregoing cases. It has been held, however, in accord with STATE EX REL. LATTANNER v. HILLS, that such an obligation is upon a sufficient consideration. Hurd v. Kelly (1879) 78 N. Y. 588, 34 Am. Rep. 567, where a bond given by a number of obligors, who bound themselves severally in separate amounts, each for himself, and not for the others, to a bank, for the purpose of being exhibited as an asset, was held to be upon a sufficient consideration. The bond itself recited that it was upon the consideration that the bank, upon the request of each of the obligors, continue its ordinary business after a date therein stated, and upon the mutual covenants contained in the instrument. The bank did continue its business after the date stated, when a receiver was appointed. The court states that the "continuance of its business and the incurring of new obligations by the bank, incident to such continuance, was a good consideration." Apparently, the defendant in the case was not connected with the bank. Others of the obligors were trustees of the bank.

v.

A. J. COX, Plff. in Certiorari.

(— Tenn. —, 188 S. W. 611.)

Parent and child — Liability for surgeon's bill.

A father whose advice is sought as to the desirability of an operation upon his minor daughter, earning her own living away from home, and who consents thereto, and suggests that he would have chosen another surgeon had he known the full circumstances, may be compelled to pay the surgeon's bill, since the circumstances do not indicate that the daughter had been fully emancipated.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by Wallace, a practising physician and surgeon, to recover for a surgical operation and attendance on Eva Cox, the seventeen-year-old daughter of defendant Cox.

Cox formerly lived in Chattanooga, but about three years before the occurrence here involved he had removed to the adjoining county of Bradley. Two of his daughters, Mary and Eva, decided to and did remain in Chattanooga to earn their own living. This they continued to do without aid from the father. The two girls were boarding at the Y. W. C. A. building when the younger sister, Eva, became ill. Dr. Wallace was called in by the matron, and, after prescribing for her for a time, decided that an operation was necessary to remove an ovarian tumor. Mary Cox telephoned the father that the doctor advised that Eva needed to be operated on. The doctor had stated that the operation would be a slight one, and when the father inquired whether an incision would have to be made, Mary replied that it would not, and that the operation would be a slight one. He replied, "Well, then, if it must be done, it must be done." Mary responded that Eva would go for the operation the next day.

Mary Cox testified that Dr. Wallace did not ask her to telephone to the father, and that she did not inform him that she had done so for several days after the operation. The surgeon testifies that in performing the services, he looked to the father for compensation.

Defendant Cox testified that he failed to hear the name of the surgeon over the telephone; that had he been informed that an incision was required, he would have gone to Chattanooga and had the operation performed by another surgeon, with whom he was personally acquainted; and that he was not asked to and did not promise to pay for the operation.

The operation was successful. Bills were sent to the father, who paid no attention to them; whereupon suit was brought.

The circuit judge, sitting without the intervention of jury, held defendant Cox not liable. The court of civil appeals divided on the question, the majority holding that plaintiff was entitled to recover as upon an implied contract.

The liability of a father for necessary medical attention given a child who has not remained as a member of his immediate family is a question upon which the authorities are at least in apparent conflict. Cases fairly supporting either of the opposing rulings of the lower courts may be found, but a number of those holding with the judgment of the circuit court take color from English cases which proceed upon the principle that a father is under only a moral obligation to support his child.

The obligation of the parent to support his child at common law was not well defined, but in this state, it has been held, more nearly in accord with the natural sense of justice, that the obligation is not merely moral, but legal, and enforceable as a legal common-law duty. Toncray v. Toncray, 2 Shannon, Cas. 408.

It therefore follows that if the parent neglects that duty, any other person who supplies such necessary attention to the child is deemed, ordinarily, to have conferred a benefit on the delinquent parent, for which the law raises an implied promise to pay on the part of the parent.

The conflict in the authorities, above referred to, is due in large part to the view the respective courts entertain of the extent in the given case of the emancipation of the absent child.

"Emancipation" of a child is the relinquishment by the parent of control and authority over the child, conferring on him the right to his earnings and terminating the parent's legal duty to support the child. It may be express, as by voluntary agreement of parent and child, or implied from such acts and conduct as import consent; it may be conditional or absolute, complete or partial. Tennessee Mfg. Co. v. James, 91 L.R.A.1917B.

Tenn. 154, 15 L.R.A. 211, 30 Am. St. Rep. 865, 18 S. W. 262; Rounds Bros. v. McDaniel, 19 Ann. Cas. 326, and note (133 Ky. 669, 134 Am. St. Rep. 482, 118 S. W. 956); 2 Words & Phrases, 2d series 242.

The emancipation of a minor is not to be presumed, and must be proved; and the burden of proof is on the father claiming immunity because of it. Lowell v. Newport, 66 Me. 78; Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 553.

In our opinion defendant Cox did not successfully carry that burden. Any emancipation indicated by the proof was limited or partial, not general or complete. The effort of the daughter to earn her own support was praiseworthy and tended to lift a burden that rested on the father himself, and the courts should be slow to permit the fact to become a shield for his protection, at least where a full emancipation is not shown. The restoration of the daughter in consequence of the surgical operation was itself beneficial to the father, since it gave the daughter ability to further relieve him, unless we are to assume, to his and the law's discredit, that he no longer owed the duty to receive and provide for her as an invalid in his home.

A well-reasoned case in point as to emancipation is Porter v. Powell, 79 Iowa, 151, 7 L.R.A. 176, 18 Am. St. Rep. 353, 44 N. W. 295, where it was held that a father was liable for a physician's services to his minor daughter, seventeen year of age, attacked by typhoid fever, 30 miles from her father's home, at a place where she had resided for a period of three years, earning and controlling her own wages, and providing herself with clothing, the father not furnishing or agreeing with the daughter to furnish her any means of support, but consenting to her absence from home. The court said: "There being no direct evidence as to the purposes of the defendant with respect to his daughter, we are to say with what intention he consented to his daughter's going and remaining away from his home as she did. That he intended she should control her own earnings, at least until such time as he should declare otherwise, is evident; but that it was ever his intention that if, by sickness or accident, she should be rendered unable to support herself, he would not be responsible to those who might minister to her actual necessities, we do not believe. Such an inference from these facts would be a discredit to any father. In our view, there was, at most, but a partial emancipation,—an emancipation from service for an indefinite time. The father had a right at any time to require the daughter to return to his home and service; and she had a right at any time to return to his service, and to claim his care, custody, control, and support. There was no such emancipation as exempted the father from liability for actual necessities furnished to his daughter. In view of the legal as well as the moral duty of appellant to furnish necessary support to his daughter during minority, and especially when unable, from infancy, disease, or accident, to earn her own necessary support, we think he may well be understood as promising payment to any third person for actual necessities furnished.

. . . As already stated, what are necessities must be determined from the facts of each case. What would be necessary support to a child in sickness would not be necessary in health. The services sued for were evidently necessary for the support and well-being of the defendant's daughter."

That there was in the case before us no complete emancipation, freeing the parent from liability for such necessary attention, is manifest from his own testimony, which shows he stood ready, in one aspect, to impose his own will as to the employment of another surgeon, preferred by him, and by the further fact that the daughters appealed to him for consent to the operation, which he gave.

The modern tendency among women and girls to earn a living frequently gives occasion for absence from home, and that fact should not readily be held to deprive them of a claim to support in a time of need. Slight circumstances, if necessary, will be allowed to control the decision.

Thus, if a minor daughter is from home for temporary employment, leaving part of her clothing and bedding at home, even though she received wages for her labor for her own use, it is not so uncommon an occurrence as to authorize an inference of such a change in the parental and filial ties as to constitute an emancipation. Searsmont v. Thorndike, 77 Me. 504, 1 Atl. 448.

We have in this case no element of abandonment of the parent by the child, or defiance of authority by the latter, and no placing of herself under the protection of another. The ruling in the case of Toncray v. Toncray, supra, is not in point. There the suit was by a pure volunteer, and some of the elements just noted appeared.

We, therefore, are of opinion that in the circumstances, showing only a partial emancipation and the assent of the father to an operation being performed, there arose a promise on his part to pay, implied by law.

The proper result was reached by the Court of Civil Appeals, and its judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Liability of parent for necessities furnished minor child who is living away from the parent's home.

Earlier cases considering the question under annotation will be found in note to P. J. Huneycutt & Co. v. Thompson, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 488.

Since the earlier note it has been held in Holland v. Hartley (1916) 171 N. C. 376, 88 S. E. 507, that uncontradicted evidence that a father permits his son to work for himself, to remain away from the parental roof, and to receive and spend the earnings of his own labor, shows an intention on the part of the father to release parental control and emancipate his son, so that he will not be liable for the care and maintenance of such child, in the absence of an express promise to pay for the same.

In Sassaman v. Wells (1913) 178 Mich. 167, 144 N. W. 478, where a minor son left home to attend school, contrary to his father's wishes, the father during such time not contributing to the son's support, it was held that the father was not liable for medical services rendered to the son, where he had no knowledge of his illness, although information thereof could easily have been given to the father. The court refused to consider the question whether the son had been emancipated, but predicated the nonliability on the lack of the son's authority, either express or implied, to pledge his father's credit, and also on the lack of an express contract between the physician and the father. The court stated that "it is manifest that the son had neither express nor implied authority to pledge his father's credit. The plaintiff made no express contract with the father, the defendant, nor were the services rendered under circumstances, such as the knowledge of the father, from which generally a promise to pay for them would be implied. If defendant is liable, it is because of some general moral or legal duty to provide necessities for his son, failing in which a stranger might supply them at his expense. . . ."

There was some evidence of a real need for medical services, none of a failure of duty on the part of the father. Nor was there any exigency, such as the imminent peril of the son and his distance from home, to take the case out of the rule that parental duty must be neglected before a stranger may supply what the parent ought to supply, at the expense of the parent." SUCCESSION OF WILLIAM S. PARKER-
SON, Appt.

(— La. —, 72 So. 953.)

Bills and notes — consideration — loss on investment.

Where, in a suit by the payee and holder of promissory notes issued on their face "for value received," instituted against the legal representatives of the deceased maker, the defendants pleaded want of consideration, held, that a valuable consideration was proved by evidence showing that the maker, a prominent attorney, acting as the adviser and agent of the plaintiff, had unwittingly invested her money in forged mortgage notes certified to be genuine by a certain notary public, and who, on the discovery of the forgery, had substituted his own notes for the forged notes, stating at the same time to the plaintiff that he was in fault for not exercising more care in the investment of her money.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division E, in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on two certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merrick, Gensler, & Schwarz, for appellant:

An agent acting gratuitously in purchasing mortgage notes for his principal from a notary of high standing, held in high regard at the time of the purchase, cannot be held responsible for loss resulting from the fact that the notes were forged. As between the maker and payee of a note, want of consideration, or partial want of consideration, is a good defense.

Mr. Walter S. Lewis, for appellee:

A debt due by another is a sufficient consideration to support the written promise of a third party to pay it.

New Orleans Gaslight & Bkg. Co. v. Paulding, 12 Rob. (La.) 378; New Orleans & C. R. Co. v. Chapman, 8 La. Ann. 98.

Land, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued as payee and holder of two promissory notes executed and signed by the decedent on August 9 and 16, 1913, respectively; one for $2,100, and the other for $3,500, and both bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from date.

The petition alleges payment of interest on the first note up to August 9, 1915, and on the second note up to August 16, 1914. Both notes recite that they were given for "value received."

The widow and testamentary executor of the deceased in her answer admitted that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the said notes executed by the late William S. Parkerson, but denied that the plaintiff gave valuable consideration therefor.

The defendant for further answer recited the circumstances under which the said notes were given, which may be briefly stated as follows:

The decedent as plaintiff's agent invested $5,600 of her money in three promissory notes, two purporting to have been signed by one Kate Regan Gardner, and the third by one John Reilly, the two first purporting to be secured by first mortgage and vendor's lien, and the third by first mortgage, on certain pieces of real estate in the city of New Orleans, as per acts of even date therewith passed before James J. Woulfe, late notary public. That upon the defalcation and exposure of the said Woulfe it developed that the said William S. Parkerson had been imposed upon and defrauded, and that the said notes so purchased for plaintiff from the said Woulfe were forgeries and worthless. That the said Parkerson thereafter gave the plaintiff his own personal notes (those sued on) for amounts equal to the amounts of the forged notes bought from the said Woulfe. That the said Parkerson was not responsible for the loss suffered by the plaintiff, having exercised all care and diligence that he was bound to exercise in making the said investment, and that the giving of his own notes for the amount thereof was a pure gratuity on his part, and was done solely out of his generosity and the desire to spare petitioner the loss which she would have otherwise sufferred, and that the said notes so given by the said William S. Parkerson are without consideration and void."

The answer admits that Parkerson during his lifetime paid the interest on said notes, and took back from the plaintiff the said forged mortgage notes, and made a claim thereon in the concursus proceedings instituted by the surety on the notarial bond of the said Woulfe, and also filed a proof of debt in the matter, "In re James J. Woulfe, Bankrupt," in the United States district court. The answer further avers that there may be a small dividend declared in the concursus proceeding, which when received will be tendered by the defendant to the plaintiff. The answer contains a reconventional demand for $126 for interest paid to the plaintiff by the defendant on certain conditions, which it is alleged were violated by the plaintiff.

The case was tried, and there was judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for, and against the defendant on her reconventional demand. The defendant has appealed.

It is not to be presumed that W. S. Parkerson intended to make a donation or gift to Mrs. Hyman. It is admitted that he purchased the three forged notes from Notary Woulfe, and turned them over to Mrs. Hyman as representing the investment of $5,600 of her money. After W. S. Parkerson discovered that the notes had been forged by the said notary, he had an interview with Mrs. Hyman, the substance of which, according to her testimony, is as follows:

Mr. Parkerson, after informing Mrs. Hyman that the three notes held by her were worthless, stated he would buy them back from her, and in answer to her inquiry whether it was fair for him to lose the money, he said: "Certainly, it is my fault; I made a bad investment, and I ought to have been more careful in looking over it before investing your money." And he further said: "Besides, I am better able to stand that loss than you are. I make between $25,000 and $30,000 a year, and you have no means of making money; consequently I will buy these notes from you, and don't worry, they belong to me."

The next day Mrs. Hyman delivered the three notes to Mr. Parkerson, who gave her his written promise to pay 6 per cent interest on them until they were paid. Later the notes sued on were substituted. Mr. Parkerson paid the interest on the notes during his lifetime. Mrs. Hyman left the management of her business affairs to Mr. Parkerson, who was an intimate friend of her deceased husband.

as a creditor of Woulfe, the notary, in not only the amounts of said three notes, but of ten others, "acquired from James J. Woulfe upon the faith of the said Woulfe's official notarial paraph, notes purporting and officially represented by him to be genuine first mortgage notes," all of which said notes were forgeries.

The defendant argues this case as if it presented merely an ordinary business transaction, involving the execution or transfer of commercial paper. As a matter of fact, the transaction involved accounting and settlement between an agent and his principal. Parkerson, the agent, was bound to account for the money intrusted to him for investment. On discovering that the money had been invested by him in forged mortgage paper on the faith of the official paraph of a notary who proved to be a scoundrel, Parkerson did not attempt to excuse himself on the ground that he was not to blame, but, according to the testimony of Mrs. Hyman, confessed his fault and want of care in the premises. The fact that Parkerson on his own motion substituted his own notes for the three forged notes is strong corroboration of Mrs. Hyman's direct and positive testimony. Parkerson took the forged notes as a basis for a claim in damages against the notary, which he vigorously prosecuted until his death.

W. S. Parkerson, prominent lawyer and business man, considered the question of his liability as agent to Mrs. Hyman, and decided that he was in fault in not exercising more care in the investment of her money. He then called on Mrs. Hyman, admitted his fault, and expressed his determination to buy or take up the forged notes at their face value. This was done by the substitution of the notes sued on. This settlement was based on an admitted legal liability on the part of Mr. Parkerson, and there is no evidence in the record tending to show that no such liability existed. Defendant's contention that Parkerson was without fault because he purchased the forged notes on the faith of notarial paraphs excludes the consideration of all other facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, and is repelled by the admissions of the agent himself. The notes sued on import a valuable consideration, and the record before us discloses a valid consideration based on the failure of the agent to exercise due care in the investment of the funds of his principal. The burden was on the defendant to show by clear evidence that the notes sued on were issued without adequate consideration.

The transaction between Parkerson and Mrs. Hyman was not a sale of the worthless forged notes, which, as stated supra, Parkerson used as a basis for his claim ex delicto against the notary, alleging that he (Parkerson) had acquired them from said notary.

We consider it unnecessary to decide whether the notes sued on may be valid as an assumption of the debt of a third person or as a security.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Consideration for note or obligation given by attorney or agent to cover loss on transactions conducted by him for principal.

There is very little to be found on this subject. Cases of promises by attorneys to clients usually relate to preliminary promises and raise the question of champerty, though there is at least one case in which during a suit the attorney promised his client that if non-suited the attorney would pay all costs, and it was held that the promise was without consideration. Mitchell v. Ball (1800) 1 N. C. pt. 2, p. 157 (Conference, 17) 2 Am. Dec. 627. It would seem that in the principal case the court might, if necessary, very well have laid it down as a principle that an attorney who in a settlement with his client voluntarily shoulders a loss, and gives his client an obligation for the amount, will not afterwards be permitted to question the validity of the obligation.

There have been cases concerning others than attorneys where notes have been made for losses. The one next referred to, however, seems possibly based on the theory now generally discarded that a mere moral obligation will support a promise.

In Scott v. Carruth (1836) 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 418, where a guardian had given his note to his ward on account of his failure to collect a claim against a third person, the court, while considering that the claim against the third person was one which the guardian ought to have collected, also said: "But in this case, if the legal liability of the defendant to the plaintiff before the giving of the note were doubtful, still, if the defendant, feeling that as guardian he had alike mistaken his duty and the rights of his ward, and deeming it improper for him to involve him who had been his ward in litigation with Vowell as to a claim which he himself should have investigated, if feeling thus, and believing, as well he might, that he was placed under a moral obligation to give the note in question, this would constitute a sufficient consideration to sustain an express promise."

In Dexter Sav. Bank v. Copeland (1885) 77 Me. 263, it was held that a note by a cashier of a bank to the bank, given to make up a loss for which the maker is neither legally nor morally responsible, is without consideration and not binding on the maker; but this holding it seems was not necessary to the decision.

In Tucker v. Haughton (1852) 9 Cush. (Mass.) 350, where the executor and sole legatee of an indebted estate lent its money to his own firm and it was lost, Shaw, Ch. J., was of the opinion that if, after a compromise and release of such executor by his successor, the released executor made a promise to a creditor of the estate to replace the loss, such promise would be without consideration. He thought, however, that there had been no promise.

Reference may be made in this connection to Hawley v. Farrar (1828) 1 Vt. 420, in which it was held that where an agent purchases goods for his principal and delivers them unopened without negligence, a promise by the agent to allow something to the principal on the price paid, on account of the damaged condition of the goods, is without consideration, moral or legal.

The question is suggested whether an obligation given to protect one's business reputation rests upon sufficient consideration. An attorney or physician, an architect or broker, or other person, may feel it better for him voluntarily to shoulder a loss for which he is not to blame than to have such loss become generally known. If he voluntarily gives a note to his client for the amount under a promise of silence, such promise is a consideration, if it be a legal consideration. If he voluntarily gives such a note without any promise on the part of the client at all, feeling that his reputation will not suffer by knowledge of a repaired loss, it is not easy to find a technical consideration, but it is not a good thing that obligations given under those circumstances should be repudiated; and they perhaps are not likely to be unless in case of the death or bankruptcy of the promisor.

In England, while an obligation given for a lost bet cannot be collected in the courts, a promise to pay if the betting creditor will refrain from publishing the default has been held to be a perfectly good promise.

Thus, in Hyams v. Stuart King [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 696, 6 B. R. C. 962, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 794, 99 L. T. N. S. 424, 24 Times L. R. 675, 52 Sol. Jo. 551, it was held that a promise to pay a betting debt in a few days if the winner would forbear to declare the loser a defaulter was a good contract,—a bet being void, and not illegal.

In Re Browne [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 133, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 446, 52 Week. Rep. 384, 90 L. T. N. S. 291, 20 Times L. R. 289, 11 Manson, 148, a betting creditor had written a letter to the committee of the debtor's club complaining of the debtor's conduct in not paying his debts of honor, and the debtor, wishing to have that letter withdrawn, gave certain cash and bills of exchange in exchange for a letter addressed to the club signed by the creditor withdrawing the previous letter of complaint. It was held that the bills were given for an altogether new consideration which was not an illegal consideration. (The cash and bills together were apparently less than the amount of the debt.)

For the general principles reference may be made to the following notes: note to Morgan v. Hodges, 15 L.R.A. 438, on "Must a claim be doubtful to sustain a compromise;" note to Armijo v. Henry, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 275, on "May void, invalid, or unfounded claim be the subject of compromise;" notes to Trimble v. Rudy, 53 L.R.A. 353, and Muir v. Kane, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 520, on moral obligation as a consideration for a promise; note to Morecraft v. Allen, L.R.A. 1915B, 1, on consideration for new agreements abrogating, altering, supplementing, or supplanting prior contracts.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,

Appt.,

v.

J. H. RITCHEY et al.

(171 Ky. 330, 188 S. W. 397.)

Partnership — name — sufficiency of surname.

The use of the surname is sufficient under a statute permitting the transaction of a partnership business under a partnership name including the true real name of at least one of the persons conducting the business, without filing a certificate setting forth the names of the members of the firm, and therefore a business may be conducted by father and son under a name consisting of the father's surname followed by the words "& son."

For other cases, see Name, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(October 4, 1916.)

A PPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cumberland County sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a warrant charging defendants with conducting their mercantile business under an assumed name without having filed in the office of the county court the statement required by statute. Affirmed.

Note.—The question, What names or designations are within statutes requiring the filing of a certificate giving certain information regarding a business conducted under an assumed or fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested, is considered in the annotation following Bolen v. Ligett, L.R.A. 1916D, 355; and see references therein to annotation on related questions. L.R.A. 1917B.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. M. Logan, Attorney General, and D. O. Myatt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant:

The mere use of the surname is not sufficient to support the provisions of § 199b of the Kentucky Statutes.

North v. Moore, 135 Cal. 621, 67 Pac. 1037.

Messrs. P. Sandidge and C. R. Hicks, for appellees:

Defendants, engaging in business under the firm name of "Ritchey & Son," were not engaged in business under an assumed name, did not violate § 199b of the Kentucky Statutes by failing to file the certificate in the clerk's office of the Cumberland county court as required by this statute.

Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 659; Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 566; Castle Bros. v. Graham, 87 App. Div. 97, 84 N. Y. Supp. 120, 180 N. Y. 553, 73 N. E. 1120; Czatt v. Case, 61 Ohio St. 392, 55 N. E. 1004.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of the commonwealth in prosecuting this appeal is to obtain this court's construction of § 199b, Kentucky Statutes. The only provisions of the act necessary to be considered are contained in subsections 1 and 4, which are as follows:

"1. No person or persons shall hereafter carry on or conduct or transact business in this state under an assumed name, or under any designation, name or style, corporate or otherwise, other than the real name or names of the individual or individuals conducting or transacting such business, unless such person or persons shall file in the office of the clerk of the county or counties in which such person or persons conduct or transact or intend to conduct or transact such business, a certificate setting forth the name under which said business is, or is to be conducted or transacted, and the true or real full name or names of the person or persons owning, conducting or transacting the same, with the postoffice address or addresses of said person or persons. Said certificate shall be executed and duly acknowledged by the person or persons so conducting, or intending to conduct, said business.

"4. This act shall in no way affect or apply to any corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, or any corporation organized under the laws of any other state and lawfully doing business in this state, nor shall this act be deemed or construed to prevent the lawful use of a partnership name or designation, provided that such partnership name or designation shall include the true real name of at least one of such persons transacting business."

It appears from the record before us that the appellees, J. H. Ritchey and F. O. Ritchey, his son, have been for several years past, and are now, partners engaged in the mercantile business in Burkesville, Cumberland county, this state, under the style and firm name of "Ritchey & Son." The father and son alone compose the partnership, and are the only persons owning an interest in the business conducted by them. In April of the present year they were both arrested under a warrant issued by the judge of the Cumberland county court, which, in substance, charged them with the offense of conducting their mercantile business under an assumed name, style, or designation, without first having filed, as required by the statute supra, in the office of the clerk of the Cumberland county court, a statement setting out fully the name or style under which their business is conducted and the true or real full name or names of the person or persons owning or conducting it, with the postoffice address of such person or persons.

The trial of appellees under the warrant occurred in the Cumberland quarterly court and before the county judge, to whom the case was submitted upon a demurrer filed by appellees to the warrant and an agreed statement showing all the facts as to themselves, their business, and in what name the business is conducted, as stated above, and, in addition, an admission by appellees that they had never filed in the office of the county court clerk the written statement which the warrant alleged to be necessary and required by the statute in question. By the judgment rendered the quarterly court overruled appellees' demurrer to the warrant, declared them guilty of the offense charged therein, and imposed upon each of them a fine of $25. Appellees took an appeal from that judgment to the Cumberland circuit court, in which court a trial by jury was waived, and the case again submitted to the court upon the demurrer to the warrant and the same agreed facts. The trial resulted in a judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the warrant. From that judgment the commonwealth, as previously stated, has appealed.

It will be observed that the offense defined by this statute is the carrying on, conducting, or transacting business under an assumed name, or under any designation, name, or style, corporate or otherwise, other than the real name or names of the individual or individuals conducting the business, without first having filed in the office of the county court clerk of the county in which the business is conducted a certificate setting forth the name under which the business is to be conducted and the true or real full name or names of the person or persons owning or conducting the business and their postoffice address. Obviously the object of the statute is to fix the identity of the person or persons owning and conducting the business, that the public doing business with them may know with whom they are dealing and become advised as to their financial ability and commercial standing. The question here presented is whether J. H. Ritchey and F. O. Ritchey, father and son, by engaging in business as partners under the firm name of Ritchey & Son without filing in the county clerk's office the certificate referred to, are violating the provisions of the statute.

To sustain a prosecution against a partnership for a violation of the statute, it must be established that they are conducting the business under an assumed name. That fact is not made to appear from the record in this case. No part of this firm name is assumed or fictitious. The name "Ritchey" is the real or true name of each of the members composing it. In adopting the style "Ritchey & Son" as a firm name, appellees gave the world notice that the firm is composed of two persons each of the name of Ritchey, as certainly as if the firm name were Ritchey & Ritchey; and the style Ritchey & Son indicates that there are but two members of the partnership, the first being the father and the last his son. There is not shown to be any other Ritchey & Son engaged in the mercantile business at Burkesville; therefore the surname Ritchey, followed by the words "& Son," as fully established the identity of the partners composing the firm as would the words "Ritchey & Ritchey" and the addition of the initials of the Christian name of each of them.

Subsection 4 of the statute expressly exempts from its operation any partnership name or designation that includes the true real name of at least one of the persons constituting the firm and conducting the business. So if, as well argued by counsel for appellees, the firm were composed of J. H. Ritchey, W. C. Smith, and O. C. Jones, and they were doing business under the firm name of Ritchey Mercantile Company, such a designation would exempt the firm from the operation of the statute. The surname "Ritchey" here used is equally applicable to each member of the firm, and as fully identifies the personnel of the partnership as if the Christian name of each of the partners were also given.

Although the question here involved has never been before this court for decision, it has been passed on in numerous other jurisdictions in construing similar and in some instances identical statutes. Thus, in Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 850, it was held that a firm name showing the surnames only of the partners is not "a fictitious name nor a designation not showing the names of the partners." In Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 566, it was held that, where the surname of all the members of the firm is Guiterman, the firm name of Guiterman Brothers is not a fictitious name, nor one not showing the names of the partners, within the meaning of § 3280, Civil Code of 1895, of that state (Rev. Codes, § 5504). In Castle v. Graham, 87 App. Div. 97, 84 N. Y. Supp. 120, it was held that the name "Castle Brothers" is not an "assumed name," nor one "other than the real name or names of the individual or individuals conducting or transacting the firm business;" and to the same effect is the opinion in Czatt v. Case, 61 Ohio St. 392, 55 N. E. 1004. Our attention has been called to no case which can be said to conflict with those referred to.

In the light of the above authorities it is our conclusion that the statute in question was correctly construed by the Circuit Court. Therefore its judgment dismissing the prosecution and discharging appellees is affirmed, and this opinion is certified to that court as the law of the case.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM R. HILL, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

J. R. POINDEXTER, Impleaded, etc.

(171 Ky. 847, 188 S. W. 851.)

Master and servant — injury by leased machine — liability.

The owner of a steam roller is not liable for injury caused by the fright of a horse due to its operation while it is in possession of a municipality to which he has leased it, and which has agreed to pay the wages of the servants operating it, and the cost of the fuel necessary to its operation. For other cases, see Master and Servant, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(November 1, 1916.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Note. — The general question, which of two or more persons is the master of a third, is considered at length in the note to Hardy v. Shedden Co. 37 L.R.A. 33. The special phase of that question which is presented by the question as to who is responsible for the acts of a driver furnished with a hired vehicle is treated in the notes to Frerker v. Nicholson, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123; Burns v. Michigan Paint Co. 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816; Morris v. Tredo, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 33; and Ash v. Century Lumber Co. 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973. For other phases of the general question consult the Indexes to L.R.A. Notes under the title, "Master and Servant," subtitle, "When the relation exists." And see also the title, "Automobiles." L.R.A. 1917B.

If the persons who were operating the roller had been held pro hac vice to be the servants of the defendant, the question might have arisen whether, as a contractor with the city, he would have been entitled to the latter's immunity from liability for damages. On this question, see the annotation to O'Connell v. Merchants' & P. Dist. Tele. Co. L.R.A. 1916D, 511, on the right of a contractor with the public to immunity which the latter enjoys from liability for damages; and in this connection see also the annotation to Schneider v. Cahill, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1008, and Ockerman v. Woodward, L.R.A. 1916A, 1006.

Messrs. B. F. Graziani and T. E. King for appellant.

Messrs. C. M. Jewett and M. O. Swinford, for appellee:

The servants in charge of the roller and operating it at the time of the accident were the special agents or servants of the city of Cynthiana, and not the servants of the appellee, Poindexter.

Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. 693, 9 C. C. A. 666, 22 U. S. App. 220, 61 Fed. 605; Messmer v. Bell & C. Co. 133 Ky. 19, 117 S. W. 346, 19 Ann. Cas. 1; Ballard & B. Co. v. Lee, 131 Ky. 412, 115 S. W. 732; Coughlan v. Cambridge, 166 Mass. 268, 44 N. E. 218; Houseman v. Philadelphia Transp. & Lighterage Co. 141 Fed. 385; McComb v. Baskerville, 20 S. D. 353, 106 N. W. 300; Samuelian v. American Tool & Mach. Co. 167 Mass. 12, 46 N. E. 98, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 447.

The court acted properly in instructing the jury that Coons was not the servant of appellee, Poindexter, for there is no conflict of testimony on that point and the evidence did not warrant its submission to the jury.

Central Consumers Co. v. Booker, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 794, 107 S. W. 198; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Teague, 134 Ky. 601, 121 S. W. 484; Clark v. Young, 146 Ky. 377, 142 S. W. 1032.

At the time of the accident the city of Cynthiana, in reconstructing the street, was performing a governmental function, and is therefore not liable for any negligence; neither would appellee, Poindexter, be liable for damages even if he were an independent contractor.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff, William R. Hill, an infant seven years of age, suing by his next friend, Riley B. Hill, brought this suit against J. R. Poindexter, Harold Poindexter, and the city of Cynthiana to recover damages for personal injuries. The city's demurrer to the petition was sustained. As to the defendant J. R. Poindexter, a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment in his favor. From that judgment, plaintiff appeals.

In March, 1913, the board of council of the city of Cynthiana passed a resolution providing for the reconstruction of Main street under the supervision of the city engineer. The committee, through its chairman, rented a steam roller from J. R. Poindexter, which was placed in charge of J. D. Coons as engineer and Obe Terry as fireman. L.R.A.1917B.

A pony which was being driven by plaintiff's mother took fright and ran away. Plaintiff, who was in the pony cart, was thrown out and severely injured. According to Mrs. Hill's testimony, she saw the roller when some distance away. It was moving in the same direction she was going. She followed behind the roller, thinking that when it reached the next street it would either continue on Main street or turn out of her way on Pleasant street. The roller, however, was reversed and began to back towards her. When the machine was about 60 feet away the pony began to show evidence of fright and shied to the west side of the street and stopped. At that time the fireman Terry seemed to be looking directly at her. As the roller continued to approach, the pony showed increased signs of fright and finally bolted and ran away. The evidence for defendant is to the effect that the pony never became frightened until it became even with or it passed the roller. The roller was immediately brought to a standstill, and it was then too late to stop the pony.

In its instructions to the jury the trial court assumed that Terry was the servant of J. R. Poindexter, and authorized a recovery by plaintiff if the jury believed from the evidence that Terry knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the pony's fright in time to have stopped the roller and prevented the accident, and failed to use ordinary care to do so. The jury were also told that Coons was not the servant of Poindexter, and that they could not find for plaintiff on account of his negligence, if any. It is insisted that a recovery should have been authorized not only for the negligence of Terry, but also for the negligence of Coons, and that the instructions given by the court were therefore erroneous. Clearly the case against Poindexter turns on whether or not Terry and Coons, the men in charge of the roller, were, at the time of the accident, Poindexter's servants or the servants of the city. The substance of the evidence on this point is as follows: Poindexter rented the roller to the city for $6 per day, the city to furnish fuel and water and to pay the men for running it. Prior to that time Terry had been in Poindexter's employ and had operated the roller for some time. Coons had not been in Poindexter's employ, but was in the employ of a blacksmith. As he was a good engineer, it was suggested that he be engaged to take charge of the engine on that occasion. The work of reconstruction had been previously ordered by resolution of the general council. The work was to be under the supervision of the city engineer. No plans or specifications were provided for the work. Terry and Coons brought the machine to Main street and reported to the city engineer. He told them what to do and how to do it. They were at all times subject to his directions and control.

In our opinion the facts of this case bring it within the rule announced in Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. 693, 9 C. C. A. 666, 22 U. S. App. 220, 61 Fed. 605. There a railroad company had rented to a bridge company its engine, engineer, and its fireman. While doing the business of the bridge company the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the engineer. It was held that the railroad company, the owner of the engine, and the original employer of the engineer were not liable for the injury. In reaching this conclusion the court, speaking through Judge Taft, said: "On this state of facts we are clearly of the opinion that the court was right in holding that the railway company was not responsible for the acts of the engineer and fireman in running the engine which killed Nason. They were, it is true, general servants of the railway company, but at the time of the accident they were engaged in the work of the bridge company, were subject to the orders of the bridge company's officers, and in what they did or failed to do were acting for the bridge company. The question is one of agency. The result is determined by the answer to the further questions. Whose work was the servant doing? and under whose control was he doing it? The railway company had simply lent its general servants to become special or particular servants of the bridge company, had for the time parted with control over them, and was not responsible for their acts while in the service and under the control of their temporary master."

Among the cases cited to sustain this view are the following: Donovan v. Laing, W. & D. Constr. Syndicate [1893] 1 Q. B. 629, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 25, 4 Reports, 317, 68 L. T. N. S. 512, 41 Week. Rep. 455, 57 J. P. 583; Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 205, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 283, 36 L. T. N. S. 49, 25 Week. Rep. 263; Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. 88 Tenn. 692, 17 Am. St. Rep. 925, 13 S. W. 691; Miller v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 655, 14 Am. St. Rep. 258, 39 N. W. 188. In the first case mentioned above the defendants contracted to lend to a firm who were engaged in loading a ship at their wharf, a crane, with a man in charge of it. The man in charge received directions from the firm or their servants as to the working of the crane, and the defendants had no control in the matter. Plaintiff, who was a servant of the wharfingers, was struck by the crane and injured, by reason of the negligence of the man in charge of it, and sued the defendants on the ground that the negligence was the act of their servant. It was held that, though the man in charge of the crane remained the general servant of the defendants, yet, as they had parted with the power of controlling him in the work in which he was engaged, they were not liable for his negligence while so employed. In delivering judgment Lord Esher said: "In this case the crane and the man to work it were lent by the defendants to Jones & Company for a consideration, and to be used in the manner I have described. For some purposes, no doubt, the man was the servant of the defendants. Probably, if he had let the crane get out of order by his neglect, and, in consequence, anyone was injured thereby, the defendants might be liable; but the accident in this case did not happen from that cause, but from the manner of working the crane. The man was bound to work the crane according to the orders, and under the entire and absolute control, of Jones & Company. That being so, whose servant was the man in charge of the crane as to the working of it? It is true that the defendants selected the man and paid his wages, and these are circumstances which, if nothing else intervened, would be strong to show that he was the servant of the defendants. So, indeed, he was as to a great many things; but as to the working of the crane he was no longer their servant, but bound to work under the orders of Jones & Company; and if they saw the man misconducting himself in working the crane, or disobeying their orders, they would have a right to discharge him from that employment. This conclusion hardly requires authority, but there is authority for it, without going back to an earlier date, in the case of Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 205, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 283, 36 L. T. N. S. 49, 25 Week. Rep. 263."

Judgments were also delivered by Lord Justices Lindley and Bowen, who followed the same line of reasoning. A different rule applies in what is known as "carriage cases." The reason for this distinction is pointed out by Lord Justice Bowen in Donovan v. Laing, W. & D. Constr. Syndicate, supra, in the following language: "The principal part of the argument for the plaintiff was founded on what may be called the carriage cases (Laugher v. Pointer, 5 Barn & C. 547, 108 Eng. Reprint, 204, 8 Dowl. & R. 550, 4 L. J. K. B. 309, and Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W. 499, 151 Eng. Reprint, 509, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 308, 4 Jur. 969), but they really have nothing to do with the point presented in this appeal. If a man lets out a carriage on hire to another, he in no sense places the coachman under the control of the hirer, except that the latter may indicate the destination to which he wishes to be driven. The coachman does not become the servant of the person he is driving, and if the coachman acts wrongfully, the hirer can only complain to the owner of the carriage. If the hirer actively interferes with the driving, and an injury occurs to anyone, the hirer may be liable, not as the master, but as the procurer and cause of the wrongful act complained of. In the present case the defendants parted for a time with control over the work of the man in charge of the crane and their responsibility for his acts ceased for a time."

In the case under consideration Poindexter did not contract to grade the street. He was not present and did not assume control of the work. He merely let the roller to the city under a contract by which the city, in addition to paying him $6 a day, agreed to pay the wages of the men in charge of the roller, together with the cost of fuel and water. The accident did not happen from any defect in the roller. It did not happen while the roller was being conveyed to the place of injury. It happened after the men had reported to the city engineer, and were then subject only to his control and directions. Even though, in a general sense, Terry and Coons were the servants of Poindexter, he is not liable for their negligence occurring while they were engaged in the special service of the city and acting solely under its orders and direction. It follows that Poindexter was entitled to a peremptory instruction. Plaintiff was not prejudiced, therefore, by the trial court's refusal to authorize a recovery based on the negligence of Coons.

Judgment affirmed.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

MICHAEL HERLIHY, Exr., etc., of Dennis Herlihy, Deceased, Resp't.,
v.

DAN J. DONOHUE et al., Appts.

(52 Mont. 601, 161 Pac. 164.)

Militia — personal liability for destruction of property.

1. Militia officers called to suppress an insurrection are personally liable for destroying without hearing or adjudication the stock of a saloon keeper for neglecting to obey an order to keep his saloon closed between specified hours, where there is nothing to show necessity for such destruction, such as a threat of the rioters to break into the building to secure the liquor, so that its destruction was necessary to prevent the excesses which might follow the free access of disorderly persons to it.

For other cases, see Militia, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — liability of subordinate officers.

2. Subordinate militia officers are not personally liable for obeying an order of their superior to destroy a stock of liquor of one who neglected to obey an order to close his saloon between certain hours, if the order might have been justified under certain circumstances.

For other cases, see Militia, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful destruction of plaintiff's property. Affirmed against defendant Donohue.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Poindexter, Attorney General, W. H. Poorman, Assistant Attorney General, Jesse B. Roote, and H. C. Hopkins for appellants.

Messrs. M. J. Doepker, Edwin M. Lamb, and Maury, Templeman, & Davies, for respondent:

Defendants were liable to plaintiff, there being no necessity for the destruction of his property.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On September 1, 1914, the governor of this state issued a proclamation declaring the county of Silver Bow in a state of insurrection. A portion of the organized militia under the command of Major Dan J. Donohue, with William Morse and Wade Gobel, subordinate officers, was ordered to the scene of the trouble for the declared purpose of restoring peace and good order and rehabilitating the civil authority in that county. Upon taking command of the troops, Major Donohue issued an order, closing saloons and other places where intoxicating liquors were for sale. This order was thereafter modified so as to permit such places to be open for business from 8 A. M. until 7 P. M. daily. On September 19th Major Donohue ordered Moree, Gobel, and certain enlisted men to take from the saloon of Dennis Herlihy the stock of liquors therein and destroy the same, and, the order having been executed, this action in trespass was brought to recover actual damages to the amount of the value of the property destroyed, and punitive damages in the sum of $1,000.

The complaint alleges the ownership and value of the property, the trespass and destruction of the property, and that the defendants acted wrongfully and with malice. The answer consists of a general denial and certain affirmative allegations, which set forth the proclamation of the governor, the original and amended order by the commanding officer, and allege that the plaintiff, Dennis Herlihy, while the amended order was in full force and effect, and with knowledge of such order, wilfully violated the same by opening his saloon and dispensing intoxicating liquors within the prohibited hours on September 17th; that at the time there was great disorder in Silver Bow county; that the commanding officer "had reason to believe and to expect that certain of the insurrectionists in said county, and law breakers therein, would cause riots to occur, and do violence to both property and human life; that, in view of these facts, said commanding officer of said military forces believed that it was imperatively necessary to forbid the sale or distribution or giving away of intoxicating liquors later than 7 o'clock in the evening and before 8 o'clock in the morning; and, in order to prevent the plaintiff herein from furnishing liquors to persons within the hours during which persons were forbidden to sell or furnish liquors to others, the said commanding officer, with certain of his subordinate officers and soldiers, destroyed the said stock of liquors belonging to the plaintiff herein as a necessary measure to prevent drunkenness, breaches of the peace, and rioting, and as an example to other retail liquor dealers, to prevent them, as well as the plaintiff herein, from either selling or giving away intoxicating liquors later than 7 o'clock in the evening and before 8 o'clock in the morning."

each of the defendants; admits that the proclamation, the order, and amended order were issued; that the appealing defendants destroyed the property in question, and denies all other facts pleaded by way of defense. After issues were joined, but before trial, Dennis Herlihy died, and the executor of his last will was substituted as a party to the action. Upon the trial plaintiff abandoned his claim for punitive damages, made out a prima facie case in other respects, and called Major Donohue as a witness to prove the destruction of the property. On cross-examination counsel for defendants sought to prove the facts pleaded in the answer and denied by the reply, but the offered evidence was excluded as not within the range of proper cross-examination. In their case in chief, defendants again offered the same character of evidence, but it was objected to upon the following, among other, grounds: "That there is no plea in the answer that the destruction of the property or any of the property was at all necessary to prevent the increasing or spreading out of the insurrection or to aid in suppressing any insurrection."

The objection was sustained, and the evidence was excluded. The court dismissed the action as to certain other defendants originally joined, and directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against these appealing defendants, leaving to the jury for determination the amount of compensatory damages only. From a judgment entered upon a verdict for plaintiff, this appeal is prosecuted. The correctness of the trial court's ruling in excluding defendants' offered evidence is the question presented for review.

1. The right of a person to acquire, hold, and protect property, to be secure in his possession of it against unreasonable seizure, and to retain it until deprived of it by due process of law, is, as among English-speaking people, as old as the common law itself. Its origin antedates by many years the guaranty contained in Magna Charta. The right itself was the inheritance of our people who inhabited the territory acquired from Great Britain at the close of the Revolution, and was adopted by the people of the territory of Montana by its first legislative assembly, and was continued in force thereafter. It is now embodied in the Bill of Rights (article 3 of our state Constitution). When, therefore, plaintiff alleged and proved his ownership of the property, its destruction by these defendants without his consent, and his damages consequent upon that act, he made out a prima facie case. Indeed, in the light of the pleadings, little proof was required from plaintiff, for by their admission of plaintiff's ownership and their destruction of the property, defendants rendered themselves liable in nominal damages at least, unless they could offer legal justification for their act. The answer, considered in its entirety, must be viewed as in the nature of a confession and avoidance,—an admission of the destruction of private property and an attempt to justify it.

That it is possible for a set of circumstances so to combine as to present a legal justification for the act of a public officer in destroying private property against the will of the owner, and leaving the owner remediless, cannot be gainsaid. The contention made in the trial court and here is that, though these defendants might possibly have set forth facts sufficient to constitute a defense, they failed to do so; in other words, that the facts pleaded do not constitute a justification for the destruction of plaintiff's property. That a defense of this character must be specially pleaded was the rule at common law. It is also the rule in most of the states where the Code system prevails, and in this jurisdiction by statute. Subdivision 2, § 6540, Revised Codes.

Let it be conceded in the first instance that the order of Major Donohue, closing the saloons from 7 P. M. until 8 A. M. daily, had the force and effect of a statute, and that for a violation of that order any reasonable punishment might have been inflicted, still we cannot concede to the organized militia, or to any department of our government, or to any function of government, the right to convict and punish without notice, a hearing, or an adjudication. Before any punishment could be inflicted upon Herlihy, notice of the charge against him, an opportunity for him to prepare and present his defense, if any he had, and an adjudication of his guilt by some competent tribunal, were indispensable. It is nowhere contended that Herlihy pleaded guilty, while the charges preferred against him in the answer are denied in the reply. The answer fails to allege that Herlihy was accused, notified, tried, or convicted before his property was confiscated; and, in the absence of these necessary allegations, the question of the extent of the punishment which might have been inflicted does not arise. Under this answer the destruction of the property cannot be justified as a penalty imposed for a violation of the order. Neither can it be justified as "a military necessity." The stock of liquors was not needed for, nor devoted to, the use of the troops. A state of war did not exist, and the destruction of the property was not necessary to prevent it falling into the hands of the enemy.

The defense must rest upon the theory that the order was a reasonable and necessary police regulation, and the destruction of the property a valid exercise of the state's police power. The order in question as amended would read as follows: "(5) All saloons and places where intoxicating liquors are sold at retail as a beverage will be closed at once and kept closed (except from 8 A. M. until 7 P. M. daily) until further orders. The stock of liquors of any person or persons violating this rule will be destroyed and all violators severely punished."

By § 5, article 7 of the Constitution, the supreme executive power is vested in the governor, who is charged with the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Section 6 provides the means available to the executive, when necessary, to execute the power or perform the duty devolved upon him: "The governor shall be commander-in-chief of the militia forces of the state, . . . and shall have power to call out any part or the whole of said forces to aid in the execution of the laws, to suppress insurrection or to repel invasion."

When the organized militia was called into the service of the state in 1914, it but performed the function of the strong arm of the executive, by which he could aid in executing the law or in suppressing the insurrection. Independently of the executive it had no power or authority, except possibly with reference to its own internal affairs. It acted as an executive agency, subject to the orders of the governor, and bound by the authority which he might lawfully exercise. The governor is at all times amenable to the Constitution and laws of the state. They are the charters of his powers, and in them he must find the authority for his official acts. While he may not exceed their bounds in any instance, he may invoke any remedy provided by them for the purpose whenever the exigencies of a particular case call for it. One of the instrumentalities, the use of which is sanctioned by the law for the preservation of peace and good order, is the police power of the state; and, while no court or text-writer has assumed to define with accuracy the limits of the power, it may be said generally that the state may regulate or control every act or thing within its jurisdiction which tends to subvert the government, to injure the public, to destroy the morals of the people, or to disturb the peace and good order of society. That the state may enforce a proper police regulation by the imposition of fine or imprisonment, or both, is conceded generally. That within the narrow limits of actual and pressing necessity private property may be taken and destroyed for the public good scarcely admits of debate. The most common illustration of this is the demolition of a building to prevent the spread of a conflagration. But in every instance where such a right has been exercised and questioned, the decision upholding the right makes it clear beyond controversy that only the most overriding necessity will justify or excuse the officer ordering such destruction.

It is not alleged that the rioters in Butte were threatening or about to break into Herlihy's saloon to obtain intoxicating liquors, and that destruction of the stock was necessary to prevent the excesses which might reasonably be expected to follow the free access of disorderly disposed persons to the liquors. It is not pretended that the arrest and imprisonment of Herlihy and the closing of his place of business during the insurrection would not have been equally efficacious as a means of preventing drunkenness, disorder, or rioting. Under constitutional government such as ours, the destruction of private property without compensation to the owner must be the last resort, available only in the presence of imminent and overwhelming necessity which brooks no delay. In failing to allege facts sufficient to disclose such necessity, the answer fails to make out a justification for the trespass, and for this reason the offered evidence was properly rejected.

2. Upon the trial, evidence was introduced to the effect that defendants Morse and Gobel were concerned in the destruction of the property to the extent only that they obeyed the order of their superior officer. This was not controverted, and may be accepted as an established fact.

The circumstances under which a subordinate military officer may be acquitted for acts otherwise wrongful, upon the score that he merely obeyed a command from one over him in authority, have received much consideration. The authorities are not agreed upon the question presented here, and a review would be of little, if any, aid. To permit an inferior military officer to stop and question the validity of every command of his superior would at once destroy discipline, and convert an army into a debating society without a monitor or referee. The same Constitution which guarantees the security of life and property provides for organized military forces in this state. When our people adopted the Constitution with its reference to the militia, they must have had in contemplation militia organized, officered, and disciplined as such forces were generally at the time. An army without discipline is a mob. The highest duty of the soldier is to obey, for upon obedience all discipline must depend. Necessity is the foundation for organized military forces, and to the extent that necessity requires it, obedience to orders is demanded. But necessity can never require obedience to an order manifestly illegal or beyond the authority of the superior to give, and therefore reason and common sense seem to justify the rule that the inferior military officer may defend his act against civil liability by reference to the order of his superior, unless such order bears upon its face the marks of its own invalidity or want of authority. If the order is one which the superior might lawfully make, the inferior cannot refuse obedience until he shall have investigated the surrounding circumstances and determined for himself that they justify the order in the particular instance. If, on the other hand, the order is so palpably illegal or without authority that any reasonably prudent man ought to recognize the fact, obedience thereto furnishes no excuse for a wrongful act, even though disobedience may subject the offender to punishment at the hands of a military tribunal.

In the present instance the order for the destruction of the property was one which Major Donohue might lawfully have made, if the circumstances of the case warranted it, and since it was valid on its face, the subordinate officers could not refuse obedience until they instituted and carried on their own investigation to ascertain whether the surrounding circumstances justified it. They could rely upon its apparent validity and justify their acts in obeying it. We believe the views expressed are in harmony with enlightened reason, and best serve the double purpose of securing private rights and protecting subordinate military officers in the execution of the duty which they may be called upon to perform.

The judgment against the defendant Donohue is affirmed. The cause is remanded to the District Court, with directions to enter judgment, dismissing the action as against defendants Morse and Gobel. The respondent may recover one half of his trial court costs and one half of his costs on appeal from the defendant Donohue. The defendants Morse and Gobel may recover from respondent one half of the trial court costs incurred by the appealing defendants, and one half of the costs incurred by appellants on appeal.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

EMMA GARLAND, Appt.,

v.

CAROLINA, CLINCHFIELD, & OHIO RAILWAY.

(— N. C. —, 90 S. E. 779.)

Carrier — carrying passenger beyond destination — storm — proximate cause.

A carrier which wrongfully carries a passenger beyond his station is not liable for injury due to his being caught in an unexpected storm while walking back to his home, at least, if he might have escaped the storm had he not stopped at the home of an acquaintance en route, or had he stayed there longer than he did.

For other cases, see Proximate Cause, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(December 6, 1916.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yancey County in her favor in part only, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in carrying plaintiff beyond her station. Affirmed.

The issues upon which the action was tried were as follows:

1. Did the defendant wrongfully carry the plaintiff by Forbes Station, as alleged?

Answer: Yes.

2. What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: $87.50.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hudgins, Watson, & Watson for appellant.

Messrs. J. J. McLaughlin and Pless & Winborne, for appellee:

Defendant was not liable.

Cooper v. Southern Exp. Co. 105 N. C. 538, 81 S. E. 743; Hallman v. Southern R. Co. 169 N. C. 127, 85 S. E. 298; Smith v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 167 N. C. 254, 83 S. E. 475.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff testified that in September, 1915, she purchased a ticket from Erwin to Forbs, a flag station on defendant's railway. The conductor took up her ticket, and slowed down at Forbs, but did not stop the train, in consequence of which plaintiff was carried to Toe Cane, 2½ miles from Forbs. She alighted from the train and walked to Forbs and crossed the river there and started home, carrying a heavy suit case. Her husband was to have met her at Forbs; but as the train did not stop, she failed to meet him. Plaintiff started home by a near path to her home 2 miles from Forbs. She carried the suit case as far as Wesley Deaton's and left it. She stopped there awhile, and then walked on to her home. She further testifies: "It was right pleasant when I got off at Toe Cane, but there came up a storm in the evening before I reached home."

She had then left Deaton's and was about 1½ miles from her home. It did not rain at all until after she left Deaton's. Plaintiff testifies that her body was wet, and that she suffered materially because of it. William Garland, the husband, testified that he was working at Wesley Deaton's; that he went to Forbs to meet his wife, but as the train did not stop, he returned to Wesley Deaton's to his work; that later in the day plaintiff came, bringing the suit case; that she went on home, leaving the suit case for him to bring home that evening.

The plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury that the plaintiff is "entitled to recover for the personal injury, inconvenience, annoyance, discomfort, and the physical effort incident to and flowing from defendant's failure in putting her off at her destination, and for the injury she suffered, if any of you find she suffered, by getting wet and carrying her suit case."

The court instructed the jury fully, but stated that plaintiff was not entitled to any damage for getting wet, and that they should not award plaintiff any damage on that account. To this charge the plaintiff excepted. This assignment of error is substantially the only question presented on this appeal. In actions founded on tort the wrongdoer is liable for all injuries resulting directly from the tort, whether they were in the contemplation of the parties or not. The rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale that the damage must be within the contemplation of the parties applies only to breaches of contract. But in torts the damages must be the legal and natural consequences of the wrongful act, and such as, according to common experience and the usual course of events, might have been reasonably anticipated. The legal proximate cause of all damage must be the tort. If the cause is remote in efficiency and does not naturally result from the tort, it will not be considered as proximate. To be such it must be "a cause that produced the result in continuous sequence, and without which it would not have occurred, and one from which any man of ordinary prudence could have foreseen that such a result was probable under all the facts as they existed." Ramsbottom v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 41, 50 S. E. 449; Brewster v. Elizabeth City, 137 N. C. 302, 49 S. E. 885.

Lord Bacon says: "It were infinite for the law to judge the causes of causes and their impulsion one on another. Therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that without looking to any further degree." Maxims, Reg. 1.

No rule of damage embraces within its scope all the resulting consequences of a given act. Such a rule would be a serious hindrance to the ordinary affairs of life. The effect would be to impose a liability entirely disproportionate to the act committed, or to the failure to perform the duty assumed, as well as the compensation received therefor. There must be a limit, and the courts have set it at a point "where for the purpose of the law, a particular cause may be said substantially to have spent its force, and to have fallen into the great mass of circumstances which has ceased to be an active force." 1 Sutherland, Damages, 111b.

Therefore common carriers are held responsible only for the ordinary and proximate consequences of their negligence, and not for those that are remote and extraordinary. Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur. "Compensation is recoverable for consequential losses only when they are proximate. Consequences are natural and probable only when, according to common experience and the usual course of events, the effect of the wrongful conduct is to set in operation the intermediate cause; that is to say, when the intermediate cause was not independent." Hale, Torts, p. 213.

Following these well-settled principles, this court held that, though a carrier negligently delayed to forward goods delivered at its depot for shipment, it was not liable for the loss of the goods by fire, when it was not negligent in respect to the fire. General Fire Extinguisher Co. v. Carolina & N. W. R. Co. 137 N. C. 278, 49 S. E. 208. Likewise it is said that in case of delay by a carrier in the delivery of goods, whereby they are destroyed by flood, when the connection between the delay and the flood is merely accidental and fortuitous, the loss of the goods is a remote consequence of the delay. 1 Sutherland, Damages, § 119.

It is held in the Federal circuit court of appeals that where, by reason of delay in constructing a vessel, it was crossing the sea at a later time than was intended, and was caught in a hurricane and destroyed, the loss of the vessel was a remote and unexpected consequence of the delay in construction. De Ford v. Maryland Steel Co. 51 C. C. A. 59, 113 Fed. 72.

A passenger was carried a short distance past his station on a dark night, and on leaving the train was misinformed by the conductor as to where he was. He soon discovered that he was south of a cross road he meant to take in going home instead of north of it, as he was told when he landed. In nearing a cattle guard en route home, his eyes deceived him, his foot slipped, and in trying to recover his balance, he fell into the culvert, which he supposed was farther off, and was seriously injured. Held that the carrier's negligence in carrying plaintiff past the station and in misinforming him was not the proximate cause of the injury, which was purely accidental, and he could not recover for it. Lewis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 54 Mich. 55, 52 Am. Rep. 790, 19 N. W. 744.

It was held by the Wisconsin court that, where a railway company carried a woman passenger beyond her destination, and she voluntarily and needlessly walked back instead of waiting for a returning train, the road was not liable for injuries sustained by her from exposure on her walk back, the damages not being the proximate result of the road's breach of duty. Le Beau v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. — Wis. —, L.R.A.1917A, 1017, 159 N. W. 577.

In Elliott v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 166 N. C. 482, 82 S. E. 853, the plaintiff was carried beyond her station and compelled to alight at another station on a cold, snowy night, and remain at the depot for some time. There was no station house, as it had been burned down. In consequence of being carried beyond her own station and put off in the cold, sleet, and snow at a station without proper accommodation, and compelled to wait there some time, plaintiff was made ill and suffered serious injury. It was held that her injury was the proximate result of the carrier's negligence. The distinction between that case and this is too obvious to need discussion.

The sudden storm that caused plaintiff to get wet was an independent, intervening, and unexpected cause, and the act of God, for which defendant was in no way responsible. If she had not stopped at Deaton's, or if she had remained there longer, she might have escaped entirely. The negligence of the defendant did not set that independent cause in motion. It was one of these accidents against which human foresight cannot provide, and was not the proximate result of the carrier's negligence.

As said by Chief Justice Cooley (Lewis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. supra): "It was after the plaintiff had been brought there that the cause of injury unexpectedly arose. If lightning had chanced to strike the plaintiff at that place, the fault of the defendant and its relation to the injury would have been the same as now, and the injury could have been charged to the defendant with precisely the same reason as now."

We are of opinion that the court properly excluded from the consideration of the jury the injuries sustained solely as the result of the thunderstorm. As there is no dispute as to the facts, and as only one deduction is possible to be drawn from them proximate cause thus became a question of law.

No error.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

J. W. BAILEY, Appt.,

v.

H. F. LONG.

(— N. C. —, 90 S. E. 809.)

Hospital — negligence — death of wife — liability to husband.

The owner of a private hospital, who, after undertaking to treat therein a woman with a broken hip, permits the room in which she is placed to be flooded with rain, causing her to contract pneumonia and die, is liable to her husband for the mental suffering and loss of society and services resulting to him therefrom.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The cause of action, as stated in the complaint, upon demurrer, must, as to the facts alleged, be taken to be true. The facts alleged are substantially these: Plaintiff's wife was suffering with a broken hip, and taken to defendant's hospital at Statesville by the plaintiff for treatment. "The defendant not only undertook and contracted to attend and care for her in a proper and skilful manner as a physician and surgeon, but also undertook and contracted to provide for her a suitable and safe room in his said hospital, and to give her proper nura-ing and attention while an inmate of his hospital."

The complaint further alleges that by reason of the defective condition and construction of defendant's hospital, and especially on account of the defective condition and construction of the windows of the room where plaintiff's wife was placed by defendant, the rains beat into the room to such an extent that the floor of the room was covered with water to a depth of more than 1 inch on several occasions while plaintiff's wife was a patient, and was allowed to remain so for the space of several hours, thus rendering the said room cold and damp, by reason of which the health of plaintiff's wife was greatly impaired, and on account of which she contracted a severe cold, which grew gradually worse, on account of the failure of the defendant to properly and skilfully treat, provide, and care for plaintiff's wife, which cold developed into pneumonia, from which she died on or about the 15th day of November, 1913.

That the unhealthy and improper condition of said room in which the sick wife of the plaintiff was placed by the defendant was due to the gross carelessness and negligent acts of the defendant, and his failure to have said room properly constructed and kept in repair for the purposes for which it was intended; that is to say, for the reception of sick patients while under treatment by said defendant in said hospital, and by reason of the careless and negligent acts and failure in duty of the defendant, as hereinbefore set out, this plaintiff has been greatly and seriously damaged and suffered great pain and mental anguish, as follows: (a) To his feelings and sympathies in witnessing the agony and suffering of his said wife, while lingering with such cold and pneumonia, and in the act and article of death, resulting therefrom. (b) In the loss to plaintiff of the society of his said wife, and the comfort, pleasure and happiness which he was accustomed to enjoy in the marital relations existing between them. (c) In the loss to plaintiff of the services of his said wife, who was in every way industrious, saving, and helpful to him in the management and conduct of his household affairs; the plaintiff by her death being left without any assistance and with no one to look after or care for the conduct of his domestic affairs.

The ground of the demurrer is that no cause of action is stated in the complaint that survived the death of the wife.

At common law the right of action for an injury to the person abated upon the death of the person injured, under the maxim "Actio personalis moritur cum persona." But causes of action accrued to those who stood to the deceased in the relation of master, parent, or husband for recovery of damages for loss of service or society. In Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493, 10 Revised Rep. 734, Lord Ellenbrough held that the husband could recover for the loss of the wife's society, and the distress of mind the plaintiff had suffered on her account, from the time of the injury until the moment of her dissolution. "And," says Mr. Tiffany, "this distinction has been followed." Death by Wrongful Act, § 16, and notes.

It was further held in England in 1875, that when a passenger on a train was injured, and, after an interval, died in consequence, his personal representative might, in an action for breach of contract of safe carriage, recover the damages to his personal estate arising in his lifetime from medical expenses and loss occasioned by his inability to attend to business. It was subsequently held in Leggott v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 509, 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 557, 35 L. T. N. S. 334, 24 Week. Rep. 784, by the Queen's bench that a prior recovery as administrator under Lord Campbell's Act was no bar to an action by such administrator to recover damages to intestate's personal estate by his inability to attend to his business from the time of the injury until death, as plaintiff sued in a different right in each case.

The supreme court of Michigan (Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180) held that when death does not at once ensue, a person entitled to the services of the one injured may recover for the loss accruing between the injury and the death, and that such action is not barred by death.

It was again held in Kentucky, where a minor son was injured by a street car and subsequently died from the injury, that the father could recover all expenses incurred for the same, care in nursing, etc., and for the loss of service from the date of injury to death. In addition, we think plaintiff can recover damages for the mental suffering and injury to his feelings in witnessing the agony and suffering of his said wife while lingering with such cold and pneumonia, and in the act and article of death resulting therefrom.

We see no reason why, if the husband can recover damages from a telegraph company for mental anguish for delay in delivering a telegram informing him of his wife's illness, he should not recover for the mental anguish occasioned by witnessing her suffering and death, against the alleged author of such suffering and death.

The demurrer is overruled, and the defendant will be allowed to answer.

Reversed.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA EX REL.
HENRY J. LINDE, Attorney General, et al.,

v.

FRANK E. PACKARD et al.

(— N. D. —, 160 N. W. 150.)

Tax — constitutional exemption — self-execution.

1. That portion of § 176 of the state Constitution which provides that "the legislative assembly shall, by a general law, exempt from taxation property used exclusively for school, religious, cemetery, or charitable purposes," was addressed to the legislature, and not to the courts. Its terms looked forward to and required "ulterior action upon the part of the lawmaking branch of the government."

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, I. a, 3, c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — exemption of fraternal societies.

2. The legislature did not exceed its constitutional powers by the enactment of subdivision 9 of § 2078 of the North Dakota Compiled Laws of 1913, which provided for the exemption from taxation of the personal and real property owned by charitable associations known as posts, lodges, chapters, councils, commanderies, consistories, and like organizations and associations not organized for profit, grand or subordinate, and used by them for places of meeting and to conduct their business and ceremonies; provided, that such property is used exclusively for such charitable purposes.

For other cases, see Taxes, I. f, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — Masonic building.

3. A building belonging to a Masonic organization, and devoted exclusively to Masonic use, the greater portion of said building being used for the place of meeting in which to conduct the business and ceremonies of various subordinate Masonic bodies, and a small portion thereof being occupied by the office of the Grand Secretary of the Masonic Grand bodies of this state, is exempt from taxation under the provisions of Christianson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding against the state tax commission, the county auditor of Cass county, and the assessor of the city of Fargo, to prevent them from assessing and listing for taxation certain property belonging to the relators. Four of the relators are separate and distinct fraternal corporations, and together constitute what is commonly known as the Scottish Rite Bodies of Fargo, North Dakota. The relators assert that they are constituent parts of the great body known as Freemasons; that the said Masonic order of which they are a part is a benevolent and charitable organization and institution, not organized for profit, but organized and existing in this state under and by virtue of the laws of this state relative to such organizations, and that the property sought to be assessed and listed for taxation is used exclusively for such charitable purposes, and is specifically exempted from taxation under the provisions of paragraph 9 of § 2078 of the 1913 Compiled Laws. The relators further assert that the state tax commission, under the alleged claim that the statute exempting relators' property from taxation is unconstitutional, have directed the city assessor to assess such property and the county auditor to place the same upon the tax rolls as taxable property, notwithstanding the provisions of the statute; and that, unless restrained from so doing, such officers will assess, and otherwise in all respects treat, such property as taxable; that the said state tax commission is endeavoring and threatens to require all other assessors and county auditors in the state to assess and cause taxes to be levied against all property of Masonic bodies throughout the state.

Respondents filed an answer wherein they deny that the property sought to be assessed is used exclusively for charitable purposes, and assert "that the paramount use to which the property of relators is put is that of a lodge, and that whatever charity is dispensed by relators is merely incidental, and that the dispensing of charity is not the object of the organization of Masonic bodies."

They further assert that paragraph 9 of § 2078, 1913 Compiled Laws, is unconstitutional and void for the reason "that it attempts to grant exemption from taxation not contemplated by § 176 of the Constitution, and is broader and more comprehensive than said constitutional provision, and is therefore unconstitutional as violating said § 176 of the state Constitution."

Relators request that we assume original jurisdiction for the reasons, among others, that the questions involved affect directly every organization whose property is declared to be exempted by the provisions of the statute in question; that the questions involved affect directly not only thousands of citizens, but practically every taxing district of the state of North Dakota; that the taxing officers mentioned are asserting official power, not by virtue of, but contrary to, the laws established by the lawmaking body of the state; that such taxing officials have arrogated to themselves sovereign rights, and thereby infringed upon the rights and prerogatives of each and every citizen of the state. The jurisdiction of the court has not been challenged. The attorney general of the state, who appears as one of the relators, joins in the application requesting this court to assume jurisdiction, and the member of the state tax commission who appears as attorney for the respondents has filed a written request that this court assume such jurisdiction. While we are not wholly satisfied that the case presented is one in which we are required to, or necessarily should, exercise original jurisdiction, still in view of all the facts, including the request of the chief law officer of the state and the request of all parties to the proceedings, including the state tax commission, and as it is clearly a matter which affects directly or indirectly every taxpayer in the state, and involves the question of legislative power to deal with the subject of exempting property from taxation, we have decided to assume jurisdiction of the controversy.

It is well settled that one who is not prejudiced by the enforcement of a legislative enactment cannot question its constitutionality or obtain a decision as to such invalidity on the ground that it impairs the rights of others, and "it has been said that courts cannot pass on the question of the constitutionality of a statute abstractly, but only as it applies and is sought to be enforced in the government of a particular case before the court, for the power to revoke or repeal a statute is not judicial in its character," although "an exception to this rule has been recognized in some jurisdictions in the case where the jurisdiction of the court itself depends on the validity of a statute, and the attention of the court is brought to that fact by persons interested in the effect to be given to the statute, although not actually interested in the case before the court" (6 R. C. L. p. 90).

And under the principle that the constitutionality of a statute cannot be questioned by one whose rights are not affected thereby and who has no interest in defeating it, it is generally held that a public officer who would not be personally liable for his acts has no such interest as entitles him to question the constitutionality of the statute. 6 R. C. L. p. 92. But there are certain well-recognized exceptions to this rule, as where the officer, in the discharge of his duties, is required to determine which of two different superior boards (one acting under a constitutional and the other under an unconstitutional statute), issuing conflicting orders, has authority to direct him in the discharge of his official duties. State ex rel. Miller v. Leech, — N. D. —, 157 N. W. 492.

Whether the respondents in this case have sufficient interest to assert the unconstitutionality of the statute exempting realtors' property from taxation is a doubtful question, and one upon which we express no opinion, as the sufficiency of the answer setting forth this defense (while referred to on oral argument) has not been challenged by motion, demurrer, or reply, and all parties virtually concede that the prime and controlling question in this case is whether the statute under consideration is constitutional, and this is in reality the only question that has been properly argued and submitted to this court.

The sole question presented for our determination in this case, therefore, is whether subdivision 9 of § 2078 of North Dakota 1918 Compiled Laws is constitutional. The state Constitution as originally adopted provided that "laws shall be passed taxing by uniform rule all property according to its true value in money, but the property of the United States and the state, county and municipal corporations, both real and personal, shall be exempt from taxation; and the legislative assembly shall by a general law exempt from taxation property used exclusively for school, religious, cemetery or charitable purposes. . . ." Const. § 176.

In 1897 the legislature, in compliance with the directions contained in the above-quoted constitutional provision, enacted legislation relating to revenue and taxation, and therein provided that "all buildings belonging to institutions of purely public charity, including public hospitals, together with the land actually occupied by such institution, not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit, and all moneys and credits appropriated solely to sustaining, and belonging exclusively to, such institutions," should be exempt from taxation. Laws 1897, chap. 126, § 5, subdiv. 6.

The Act of 1897 as well as § 176 of the Constitution was construed by this court in Engstad v. Grand Forks County, 10 N. D. 54, 84 N. W. 577. In that decision this court held that the clause in § 176 of the state Constitution, that "the legislative assembly shall, by a general law, exempt from taxation property used exclusively for school, religious, cemetery, or charitable purposes," was not self-executing, but "lays a command upon the legislative assembly, and requires that body, by general law, to exempt certain property from taxation, among which is property used exclusively for charitable purposes." The court further held that the provisions of the act did not apply to property which was owned and operated by an individual, but that only property belonging to an institution was within the provisions of the statute. In disposing of the contention that the statute, if so construed, would be unconstitutional, the court said: "It may possibly have been the legislative purpose, in enacting the general exemption law embraced in § 1180, supra, to fully comply with this constitutional mandate; but we are not at liberty to indulge in mere conjecture as to what was intended. Our duty is to fairly construe the language actually employed by the legislature, and from it determine the legislative intent. In doing so, we reach the conclusion, as has been seen, that the legislature did not intend to go as far as the language of the Constitution required it to go. The legislature, by its language, has not exempted from taxation any and all property devoted exclusively to charitable uses, but has, on the contrary, only exempted so much thereof as belongs to 'institutions' which dispense public charity. But, in exempting only a part of the property which is or may be devoted to charitable uses, there has been no violation of any inhibition found in the organic law. The Constitution required the legislature to exempt what it has exempted; but the law making body has not, perhaps, gone to the full extent required by the very broad terms employed in the clause we have quoted from § 176 of the state Constitution. It is certainly clear to our minds that, notwithstanding the fact that the legislative branch has not seen fit to execute the constitutional mandate to the full measure intended, such omission cannot operate to annul a statute which does execute the mandate, but only in part."

The opinion in Engstad v. Grand Forks County, supra, was filed on November 22, 1900. The legislative assembly which convened in January, 1901, amended the law construed in Engstad v. Grand Forks County, supra, and incorporated therein subdivision 9 (the provision involved in this proceeding), which provides for the exemption from taxation of "the personal and real property owned by charitable associations known as posts, lodges, chapters, councils, commanderies, consistories, and like organizations and associations not organized for profit, grand or subordinate, and used by them for places of meeting and to conduct their business and ceremonies; provided, however, that such property is used exclusively for such charitable purposes." Laws 1901, chap. 152.

The legislative enactment of 1901 contained an emergency clause, declaring that an emergency existed "in that there is no exemption from taxation of the class of property mentioned in subdivision 9," and that therefore the act should take effect and be in force from and after its approval. The same legislature also enacted laws providing that "associations known as lodges, chapters, posts, encampments, councils, commanderies, consistories and other similar organizations, having a seal and working under a charter issued by some grand or sovereign body of a like character to themselves, of the fraternities or associations commonly known as the various organizations of Freemasons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Grand Army of the Republic, Knights of Pythias and other similar benevolent or charitable fraternities or associations, not organized for profit or for fraternal insurance, located in this state, shall, from and after the taking effect of this article, be deemed to be corporations, notwithstanding no articles of incorporation have been filed, and no charter granted by this state. . . . Any such association has power: . . . 9. To apply its funds and property to charitable and benevolent objects pursuant to the purpose for which such association is organized." Laws 1901, chap. 89, §§ 1, 6, §§ 5025, 5030, Comp. Laws 1913.

The legislative intent expressed in the above-quoted statutory provisions seems too plain for doubt. The legislature declared the various Masonic bodies and other like organizations to be "charitable associations." The legislature further declared that the property used by such bodies for places of meeting and to conduct their business and ceremonies is used for charitable purposes. The language used by the legislature is so plain and the legislative purpose and intent so manifest that no doubt can exist. But if the meaning of the statute be deemed doubtful, we are reminded that the foregoing provisions have remained part of the statute law of this state since 1901, although subsequent legislatures have made certain changes in the law designating the property declared to be exempt from taxation. That the same legislature which created the state tax commission also amended and re-enacted the law classifying the property declared to be exempt from taxation, and the provision involved in this controversy (subdiv. 9, § 2078, Comp. Laws 1913) was re-enacted without any modification whatever. Laws 1911, chap. 290. It was again re-enacted L.R.A.1917B.

by the legislature in 1913. Laws 1913, chap. 280.

The provision, therefore, has remained a part of the statute law of this state for fifteen years. During this time it has not only been treated as valid by the various administrative officers and boards, but has received the approval of three different legislative assemblies and three different governors. In fact, as we have already stated, it was re-enacted by the same legislative assembly and approved by the same governor, who respectively enacted and approved the law creating the state tax commission itself. The contemporaneous construction placed thereon by the various administrative officers and boards is entitled to great weight, and the acquiescence in and approval of such construction by subsequent legislative assemblies and chief executives ought to dispel all possible doubt as to the legislative intent. 36 Cyc. 1140, 1142; Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. §§ 472 et seq.

The state tax commission, however, contends that the Masonic bodies are not charitable associations, and that property used for their places of meeting and to conduct their business and ceremonies is not used for charitable purposes; that it was beyond the constitutional power of the legislature to so declare, and that consequently the provision under consideration is unconstitutional. The relators, on the other hand, contend that the Masonic bodies are charitable associations, and that property used exclusively for the Masonic purposes designated in the statute is in fact used exclusively for charitable purposes; that the legislature is vested with power to determine what property is used exclusively for charitable purposes, and that the legislature in exercise of this power has determined that the property of Masonic organizations, when used for places of meeting and to conduct their business and ceremonies of such organizations, is used exclusively for charitable purposes.

Much space has been devoted in the briefs of the respective counsel to, and many authorities have been cited upon, the question of what is meant by the word "charity" and its derivative "charitable." The word "charity," like many other words, has both a lay meaning and a legal meaning. 5 R. C. L. 291. The principle of charity was recognized, even before the adoption of Christianity, by the Roman law. 6 Cyc. 898. And while certain ingredients of the Roman law were incorporated into the common law of England, there was also incorporated with them the ecclesiastical element introduced with Christianity. 5 R. C. L. 296; 6 Cyc. 898. And the term "charity," as used in our law, "no doubt takes shades of meaning from the Christian religion, which has largely affected the great body of our laws." Allen v. Duffie, 43 Mich. 1, 38 Am. Rep. 159, 4 N. W. 427; First M. E. Church v. Donnell, 110 Iowa, 5, 46 L.R.A. 858, 81 N. W. 171; Ould v. Washington Hospital, 95 U. S. 303, 24 L. ed. 450. And "the oft-recurring prayer, 'This do in work of charity,' in the earliest appeals to the English chancellor by those who had no remedy, shows that the common, if not the equitable, concept of the term under Christian influence was the same in remote and modern times." 6 Cyc. 898.

In the broadest sense charity includes whatever proceeds from the sense of moral duty or from humane feelings towards others, uninfluenced by one's own advantage or pleasure. 6 Cyc. 897.

Ruling Case Law (5 R. C. L. pp. 292, 293) says: "A precise and complete definition of a legal charity is hardly to be found in the books, but it is certain that in legal parlance the word 'charity' has a much wider significance than in common speech. Probably the most comprehensive and carefully drawn definition of a charity that has ever been formulated is that it is a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves for life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called charitable in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show that it is charitable in its nature. Another definition capable of being easily understood and applied is that given by Lord Camden as follows: 'A gift to a general public use, which extends to the poor as well as the rich.' The theory of this is that the immediate persons benefited may be of a particular class, and yet, if the use is public in the sense that it promotes the general welfare in some way, it has the essentials of a charity. Again, charity has been declared to be active goodness; the doing good to our fellow men, fostering those institutions that are established to relieve pain, to prevent suffering, and to do good to mankind in general, or to any class or portion of mankind."

The question whether a Masonic lodge is, in law, a charitable organization, while a new one in this court, is by no means a new one in the legal annals of this country. This question has been presented to and determined by many different courts, and L.R.A.1917B.

while there is some conflict among the decisions, the greater weight of authority sustains the view that a Masonic lodge is a charitable organization. See Morrow v. Smith, 145 Iowa, 514, 124 N. W. 318, and extended notes to this decision as reported in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 606, and Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1183. See also Fitterer v. Crawford, 157 Mo. 51, 50 L.R.A. 191, 57 S. W. 532; State ex rel. Bartel v. Board of Assessors, 34 La. Ann. 574; Indianapolis v. Grand Master G. L. 25 Ind. 522; Salt Lake Lodge v. Groesbeck, 40 Utah, 1, 120 Pac. 194, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 940; Plattsmouth Lodge v. Cass County, 79 Neb. 463, 113 N. W. 167; Cumberland Lodge v. Nashville, 127 Tenn. 284, 154 S. W. 1141; 5 R. C. L. 373.

It is unnecessary for us, however, in this case, to determine whether a Masonic lodge is a charitable organization. The legislature has determined this question, and in positive and unequivocal terms declared that the several Masonic bodies are charitable organizations, and that their property, when used for the purposes specified in the statute, is used for charitable purposes, and as such, exempt from taxation. We are not called upon, nor is it our function, to review the correctness of this legislative determination. 6 R. C. L. p. 112. For it must be presumed that the legislature had before it when the statute was passed any evidence that was required to enable it to act; and the passage of the statute must be deemed a finding by the legislature of the existence of the facts justifying the enactment thereof. 6 R. C. L. pp. 102, 111, 112. We have no power to supervise the acts of the legislature, or substitute our judgment for its judgment upon any matter within the scope of its constitutional powers. Our authority is limited to an inquiry into and a determination of whether the legislature has exceeded its constitutional powers, and has arbitrarily classified property as entitled to exemption from taxation on the ground that it was used for charitable purposes, when clearly and unquestionably the property sought to be exempted is not within the class which the legislature has declared it to be.

Every reasonable presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of a legislative enactment, as it is presumed that the legislature acted within its constitutional powers and enacted a valid law. This presumption is conclusive unless it is clearly shown that the enactment is prohibited by the state or Federal Constitution. State ex rel. Linde v. Taylor, — N. D. —, 166 N. W. 564.

The primary duty of the courts is to construe statutes with reference to the Constitution, and it is only when a statute clearly violates the provisions of the Constitution that the courts may declare the statute to be unconstitutional. 6 R. C. L. p. 102.

The authorities cited furnish small aid in determining the question before us. Most of the decisions cited involved the construction of some particular statute and a determination of whether a Masonic lodge (or some other fraternal body) was, in fact, a charitable organization within the meaning of the particular statute construed. That is true of the decision of the supreme court of Maine in the leading case of Bangor v. Rising Virtue Lodge, 73 Me. 428, 40 Am. Rep. 369. It is true of the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in Boston Lodge v. Boston, 217 Mass. 176, 104 N. E. 433; of the decision of the supreme court of Wisconsin in Green Bay Lodge v. Green Bay, 122 Wis. 452, 106 Am. St. Rep. 984, 100 N. W. 837; and of the decision of the supreme court of Michigan in Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 113 Mich. 388, 71 N. W. 632. And the statute construed in the latter case expressly provided that the exemption granted thereby should "not apply to fraternal or secret societies." The question of whether the legislature had constitutional power to classify Masonic lodges as charitable organizations, and exempt from taxation their property used exclusively for Masonic purposes, was not involved in any of those cases. And while in other decisions constitutional provisions are referred to and considered in connection with the construction of the statute involved, no authority has been called to our attention wherein a court was confronted with a legislative enactment (as in the case at bar) which specifically declared the different Masonic bodies to be charitable organizations, and the property belonging to such bodies and actually used by them exclusively for their corporate or associated purposes to be exempt from taxation, on the ground that such property is used for charitable purposes. And while in many of the different authorities cited, general statutes exempting the property of charitable organizations or property used for charitable purposes from taxation were construed, a great number, in fact a greater number, of the courts found, as a matter of fact, that Masonic bodies are charitable organizations, and as such entitled to the benefits of the general statutes exempting the property of such organizations from taxation. See Morrow v. Smith, 145 Iowa, 514, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, 124 N. W. 316, and authorities collated in an extended note to this case as published in Ann. Cas. 1912A, p. 1187. L.R.A.1917B.

The North Dakota Constitution was framed and adopted in 1889. Long prior thereto a number of the courts of this country had declared the society of Freemasons to be a charitable organization. It was so adjudged by the supreme court of Alabama in 1861 (Burdine v. Grand Lodge, 37 Ala. 478); by the supreme court of Indiana in 1865 (Indianapolis v. Grand Master, G. L. 25 Ind. 518); by the supreme court of Georgia in 1874 (Savannah v. Solomon's Lodge, 53 Ga. 93); by the supreme court of Maryland in 1879 (Baltimore v. Grand Lodge, 50 Md. 421); by the supreme court of Louisiana in 1882 (State ex rel. Bertel v. Board of Assessors, 34 La. Ann. 574). And in the case of King v. Parker, 9 Cush. 71, decided in 1851, the supreme court of Massachusetts held that a trust expressed in a deed to individuals for the use of an unincorporated Masonic lodge was in its nature perpetual, since one of the leading objects of such lodge was that of charity. In Burdine v. Grand Lodge, supra, the supreme court of Alabama said: "The society known as Freemasons has long existed in this country, and in almost or quite every part of it. The purpose and object of the society have been made public in numerous books, periodicals, and public addresses. From all these sources of information, and from the generally received and accredited judgment of the public, the sole purpose and object with which Masonic institutions acquire money and property, beyond their current expenses as a society (furniture, lights, fuel, stationery, and the like), are for the bestowal of reliefs and charities to the needy. In addition, the third and fourth sections of the act to incorporate Masonic lodges in the state of Alabama tend to confirm the belief that the society is eleemosynary in its aims. Under these circumstances, we hold that we will take judicial notice that the grand and subordinate lodges of Freemasons within the state of Alabama constitute a charitable or eleemosynary corporation." 37 Ala. 482.

While not necessary to a determination of this cause, it may be mentioned that relators assert that the charitable nature of the Masonic organization is established by the following facts set out in the petition herein: "The object and purpose of the said order of Freemasonry is philanthropy, benevolence, and to carry out all charitable purposes and objects, all of which is not confined to its members, but extends to all people at large, and that among other objects and purposes is the object and purpose to nurse, care for, and provide for its sick, afflicted, and needy members and their families, and bury the dead; to care for the widows of its deceased members and educate their orphan children; to contribute to the maintenance and support of certain homes and public sanitariums for indigent and afflicted persons, located in this state and elsewhere; to furnish the funds necessary to build and maintain tubercular sanitariums; to contribute to and assist in the support of public institutions of charity; to care for and assist in caring for destitute persons, whether members or not, who may become a charge upon the public of the state of North Dakota; that such things as hereinbefore set out are not confined to the members of the said order and their families, but extends to all who are in need or distress; that among the specific things now being done in furtherance of said objects and purposes are these: The furnishing of the funds necessary to build and maintain a sanitarium for tubercular patients in the state of North Dakota, and to build and maintain a Masonic cottage at Dunseith Sanitarium for tubercular patients; to operate and maintain the Masonic Welfare Association, which organization collects and disburses to indigent and distressed persons who are members of the several Masonic orders funds of many hundred dollars per year, a portion of which said fund is disbursed as a public charity to non-Masons; the operation and maintenance of a fund known as an 'almoner's fund,' which fund is collected and disbursed by an officer known as the 'almoner' exclusively in general public charity to the extent of several hundred dollars per year, and which disbursement is made by the almoner secretary, and without being subjected to the supervision of any specific officer or board, and is devoted wholly and exclusively to the needy and distressed among the general public to whom the almoner is referred, or whom he finds by his own investigation; the collecting and disbursing, to organized public charities such as the State Children's Home, the Crittenton Home, the Front Street Mission in the city of Fargo, the Salvation Army, and like organizations, funds aggregating hundreds of dollars annually, all of which are exclusive public charities; the collecting and distributing to its indigent and distressed members and to non-Masons, funds amounting to several hundred dollars per year; the raising of funds and contributing to public charities such as the Belgian Relief Fund, Red Cross Funds, Associated Charities, and all matters of public need; the maintenance of and assistance in maintenance of employment agencies to assist without charge Masons and their families in finding places of employment; that the extent of said benevolent and charitable work of the said order is large and greater than any public charity in the state of North Dakota, and that as an illustration thereof affiant alleges that the said Masonic organization contributes fully one half of the moneys and funds necessary to maintain the Children's Home in Fargo, an institution of great public charity and need.

Affiant further says that one of the general and primary objects of said order and institution is to apply in general to its members and to all persons the principle of benevolence and philanthropy, and to extend charity in its broadest and highest meaning to any and all persons with whom its members come in contact, and that all of the said property of the relator is used exclusively for the purposes as hereinbefore set out, and that the property in question is only to a minor extent used for administrative purposes, and that less than one tenth of the space of said building before referred to is used in providing offices for the officers engaged in the administration of the business of the said Masonic bodies, and that no revenue or income is received from the use of said properties except that such revenues and income, as hereinbefore set out and as derived from the dues of said members, is used exclusively for the maintenance of said buildings, and to be expended in the foregoing matters of benevolence, philanthropy, and charity, and to carry out the objects and purposes hereinbefore set forth, and that such property is not in any manner used for business purposes."

No attempt was made to define "charitable purposes" in the state Constitution, or to determine what organizations or institutions would be entitled to the benefit of the exemption which the Constitution directed the legislature to put into effect. Nothing was said to indicate any intent to exclude secret or fraternal societies from the benefit of such exemption, or (as in some states) to restrict such exemption to property devoted purely and exclusively to purposes of "public" charity.

When the constitutional convention framed, and the people adopted, the Constitution, they not only invested the legislature with power to exempt from taxation certain classes of property, but they in plain and unmistakable terms directed "that the legislative assembly shall by general law exempt from taxation property used exclusively for school, religious, cemetery, or charitable purposes." Const. § 176.

This constitutional command was addressed to the legislature, and not to the courts. 6 R. C. L. 58. The provision was not self-executing. Its terms looked forward to and required "ulterior action upon the part of the lawmaking branch of the government." Engstad v. Grand Forks Co. 10 N. D. 54, 84 N. W. 577. The governmental policy therein declared depended upon, and could be put into effect only by, legislative action.

The provision related to taxation,—a matter peculiarly within the province of the legislative department of the government. 37 Cyc. 724. See also §§ 174 to 181, inclusive, State Const. It involved and required the exercise of legislative power to give effect to a governmental policy announced in the Constitution. Consequently the contemporaneous construction and interpretation given by the legislature is entitled to a great deal of weight, and should not be departed from unless manifestly erroneous. 6 R. C. L. p. 63. See also Gaar, S. & Co. v. Sorum, 11 N. D. 174, 90 N. W. 799.

The legislative construction and determination, as we have already stated, was in harmony with the weight of judicial authority in this country. And in our opinion we have no right to say that the legislature exceeded its constitutional authority in enacting the statute under consideration.

It is also suggested by the respondents that the property is not exempt for the reason that the office of the secretary of the Masonic Grand lodge and other grand bodies is maintained in this building. The statutes which we have quoted are not susceptible of this construction. The intent was clearly to exempt from taxation all property belonging to Masonic organizations and devoted exclusively to Masonic use; i. e., "for places of meeting, and to conduct their business and ceremonies." The legislative intent seems plain. No part of the building is leased for profit or income for business or non-Masonic purposes. The entire property is devoted solely to purposes connected directly with and essential to the maintenance of the Masonic organization in this state. The property is clearly within the provisions of the statute, and it is our duty to give effect to the law as promulgated by the lawmaking branch of the government.

The writ will issue as prayed for.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JAY E. CUNNINGHAM et al.
v.

L. L. COKELY, Clerk of the Circuit Court of Ritchie County, et al.

(— W. Va. —, 90 S. E. 546.)

Election — primary — regulation.

1. Primary elections are so far matters of public concern that, within legislative discretion, when not restrained by any constitutional inhibition, they are proper subjects of reasonable statutory regulations under the police power of the state. Such regulations are vital to the accomplishment of the purpose and scheme of nominating elections.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law II. c. 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — party organization.

2. Statutes providing for such elections are based on a recognition of political parties as governmental agencies, and are usually intended to maintain party organizations and secure the integrity of party nominations.

For other cases, see Elections, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

Note. — As to constitutionality of primary election laws, see annotation to People ex rel. Phillips v. Strassheim, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135; State ex rel. Miller v. Flaherty, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 132; and Waples v. Marrast, L.R.A. 1917A, 259; and see also Baer v. Gore, post, 723. L.R.A. 1917B.

Same — participation.

3. No political party organization not comprehended within the definition found in § 1 of the Primary Election Law (Laws 1915, chap. 26), when properly interpreted, can participate in such elections.

For other cases, see Elections, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Officer — nomination — certificates.

4. A political organization so excluded cannot nominate presidential electors, except by certificates signed by electors numerically equal to 5 per cent of all the votes cast therefor in the next preceding general election held in the state.

For other cases, see Elections, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Elections — primary — constitutionality.

5. The provisions of Primary Law (Barnes's Code, chap. 3, § 26a) §§ 1, 23, 29, defining political parties on the basis of a fixed percentage of the vote cast at the last general election held in the state, requiring them to select their candidates by primary election and convention, and authorizing nominations by lesser groups of voters to be made solely by petition, do not constitute an infringement of any inhibition prescribed by the Constitution of this state.

For other cases, see Elections, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Statutes — same subject — repeal.

6. When two statutes passed at different dates cover and fully provide for the same general subject, the subsequent one, not purporting to amend the earlier act, but manifestly intended to be a substitute therefor, is to be deemed and treated as the last legislative expression on that subject, and as operative to repeal the former statute by necessary implication.

For other cases, see Statutes, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to place on the official ballot for the general election the names of the presidential electors nominated by the Prohibition party at a state convention. Refused.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Squire Halstead and J. Howard Holt, for petitioners:

If chapter 26, Acts of 1915, by any part of its provisions prevents the placing of the presidential electors of the Prohibition party on the official ballot at the election to be held on November 7th, 1916, it is unconstitutional and void as opposed to article 4, § 1, of the Constitution of West Virginia, giving to the male citizens of this state the right to vote.

State v. Staten, 6 Coldw. 233; Britton v. Election Comrs. 129 Cal. 337, 51 L.R.A. 115, 61 Pac. 1115.

Denying to a political party which cast less than 5 per cent of the votes at the next preceding election the right to the privileges and protection accorded to other political parties, and thereby prohibiting the members of such party from holding a nominating convention, is a deprivation of the right of franchise.

Britton v. Election Comrs. supra.

Denying to a political party which cast less than 5 per cent of the vote at the next preceding election the right to the privileges and protection accorded to other political parties, and thereby prohibiting the members of such party from holding a nominating convention, is special legislation and opposed to art. 6, § 39, of the Constitution of West Virginia.

A political party is a body of men in a state, district, county, or city, united in political thought and action for the accomplishment of a political end, or united in political opposition to another body of men joined in political action; and each body of men so united is entitled to the same and equal rights before the law.

Messrs. S. A. Powell and Adams & Cooper for respondents.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relators, Cunningham and others, alleging themselves to be citizens and voters resident within the state, and members of a political organization called and known as the Prohibition party, pray a writ of mandamus to compel the ballot commissioners of Ritchie county to place on the official ballot for the general election in November, 1916, the names of the presidential electors nominated by the party at a state convention held for that purpose at Clarksburg, June 7, 1916. Its nomination of candidates for President and Vice President of the United States was made by the national convention of the party held at St. Paul in the ensuing July. The usual certificates of nominations were tendered to the clerk of the circuit court of Ritchie county, accompanied by a request to receive and file them, with which it is alleged he refused to comply.

In response to the alternative writ awarded according to the prayer of the petition, the respondent Cokely, the clerk, and the other ballot commissioners appointed by him, admit the facts alleged, and deny the right of the relators to compel them to place the names of such candidates on the official ballot as so requested.

The pleadings present one question only for adjudication,—one purely legal. This question must be determined—indeed, it can only be determined—from an interpretation of the statutes of this state governing the nomination of candidates for public office. The advisability or propriety of the statutes are questions proper only for legislative consideration, unless they conflict with some constitutional provision. Except in so far as the organic law of the state forbids, it is competent for the legislature to enact laws regulating and controlling nominations and elections of public officials. Both are matters of public concern, and subjects of proper and reasonable legislative regulation, restriction, and control. The exercise of that function is limited and restrained only by that instrument. To deprive the legislature of its regulatory power and authority, it must appear affirmatively and unmistakably that it has exceeded the bounds so prescribed. It is not, however, so much a question of what the Constitution permits the legislature to do as what the Constitution prohibits it from doing. Unless the inhibition urged essentially is imperative or indubitably inferential, the courts are powerless to declare an enactment violative of the organic law. The unconstitutionality of law must obviously appear. This requirement generally is recognized in all jurisdictions.

It is impliedly, if not actually, admitted that the Primary Election Law (Acts 1915, chap. 26; Barnes's Code § 26a, chap. 3) contains no provision for the nomination, by election or convention, or the candidates of any organization not comprehended within the definition of political parties found in the 1st section of the act; that the Prohibition party is not within that definition, because it is not a political "organization which at the last preceding general election polled for its candidates for representatives in congress in the several districts at least 5 per cent of the entire vote cast for that office in the state." Relators neither aver nor prove that their party did cast that number of votes. They make no such pretension.

Nor, for the same reason, did or could the Prohibition party assert any right to act under § 29 of the Primary Law, authorizing each "political party," in the month of August of each year in which a President of the United States is to be elected, to "hold a meeting . . . formulate and promulgate a state platform, and select presidential electors for the state at large, and each congressional district." To invoke this act, it is essential that an organization come within the definition of a political party found in § 1. Not having the required percentage of the vote at the last general election, the party represented by the relators could not claim the benefit of the statute.

However, relators do insist on two propositions; on being that, as the Prohibition party was an active political organization at and prior to the passage of the primary election law, it cannot lawfully be deprived of its right to representation on the official ballot through its party nominations made in what they claim to be a duly constituted convention, and duly certified to the clerk of the circuit court of Ritchie county. Reliance for that contention is placed solely on § 18, chap. 3, Code 1913. That statute did authorize the nomination of candidates for public office by an organized assemblage of voters or delegates of any political party which at the general election next preceding such convention polled at least 3 per cent of the entire vote of the state, or any division thereof for which the nominations are made, "or have had nominations on the official ballot for the state or any division or subdivision thereof, for the last preceding ten years." To show themselves qualified to invoke the provisions of the section in justification of the award of the final writ, the relators aver the continued existence of the Prohibition party as a national political organization and the regularity of its quadrennial nominations of presidential electors since and including the year 1872, and of its state organization and nominations since and including the year 1884, and that in the year 1912 it polled in this state "in the neighborhood of 5,800 votes" for its candidate for governor, of which 160 were cast in Ritchie county. The first provision of the act, however, prescribes as the true test of the right to representation on the official ballot the required percentage of the votes cast in the general election held in 1914, as to which there is neither averment nor proof. But, in any event, the candidates of the Prohibition party received numerically less than 3 per cent of any combination of votes cast for any office filled by the general election held in this state in either year. So that, even if the section were still in force, its first clause does not inure to the advantage of any political organization whose adherents cast less than the required number of votes at the preceding general election. Nor is the latter clause of the section applicable. Manifestly, the entire section was repealed by the Primary Act. That statute contained a clause expressly repealing all prior legislation inconsistent therewith. Moreover, it covered the whole subject of nominations for public office. It required political parties, as defined therein, to designate their candidates by means of a primary election, except candidates for presidential electors, and judges, and these § 29 requires to be named by the convention thereby prescribed. With reference to political organizations not comprehended within the definition of a political party, a mode of nomination by petition was provided. It is obvious that the Primary Act, dealing comprehensively and fully with the matter of official nominations, was not intended to be amendatory of older statutes on the same subject, or supplementary thereto, but as an elaborate and ample scheme for the selection of political nominees. So construed, it repeals by necessary implication § 18, chap. 3, Code 1913, relating to conventions. As stated in Grant v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 66 W. Va. 175, 66 S. E. 709: "A later statute, covering the whole subject matter of an earlier one, not purporting to amend it, and plainly showing it was intended to be a substitute for the earlier act, works a repeal of such earlier act by implication, even though the two are not repugnant in the usual sense of the term."

See also Hawkins v. Bare, 63 W. Va. 431, 60 S. E. 391; Vansant v. Com. 108 Va. 135, 60 S. E. 753.

The Primary Law of Minnesota defined a political party as one casting 10 per cent of the total vote of the last election for its leading candidate, and provided that the nomination of such parties should be made in accordance with that act, reserving the right to lesser groups of voters to nominate their candidates by petition, as authorized by a prior law still in force. The Primary Act was held to repeal by implication the general statute providing for conventions. Hence, chapter 28, Acts 1915, must be regarded as prescribing the exclusive modes whereby political nominations may be made in this state.

Tersely stated, the second proposition advanced is that the primary statute if held effectual as a repeal of § 18, chap. 3, Code, is based upon an arbitrary and discriminatory classification of voters, operative to destroy minor political party organizations, and violative of various provisions of the state Constitution. Is the act amenable to that criticism? That is the paramount and vital inquiry.

The relators rely for support of their contention against the legal validity of the act on three California decisions, which, upon the particular facts and laws involved therein, do in fact adopt that view. Britton v. Election Comrs. 129 Cal. 337, 51 L.R.A. 115, 61 Pac. 1115, citing the other two cases. Therein the law of that state of 1899 was held invalid as to that provision prohibiting the election of delegates to a convention of any political party not representing 3 per cent of the votes cast at the last election; but the principal reason assigned for the decision was that the act provided no other way by which minor parties might get on the ballot for the general election. No legal method was rendered available to them whereby they might select candidates and thus secure representation at the polls. But in the later case of Katz v. Fitzgerald, 162 Cal. 433, 93 Pac. 112, after the California Constitution had been changed so as in general terms to sanction nominating primaries, the same court held constitutional a law classifying voters and excluding from the primary parties casting less than 3 per cent of the last vote in the general election. It was held there was "no discrimination between large and small political parties," and that the percentage clause was a necessary and rational provision. These restrictions, especially where other modes of making nominations are afforded the minor political groups, uniformly are deemed and interpreted as valid and essential to the efficiency of the primary system. State ex rel. Hagedorf v. Blaisdell, 20 N. D. 622, 127 N. W. 720; Riter v. Douglass, 32 Nev. 401, 109 Pac. 444; State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 776, 105 N. W. 174; State ex rel. Labauve v. Michel, 121 La. 378, 46 So. 430; State ex rel. Webber v. Felton, 77 Ohio St. 554, 84 N. E. 85, 12 Ann. Cas. 65. The percentage of the vote fixed as the basis of party classification by the statutes passed upon in these cases ranged from 1 to 10 per cent. It may be well to summarize briefly other decisions.

In State ex rel. Labauve v. Michel, 121 La. 378, 46 So. 430, and Ladd v. Holmes, 40 Or. 187, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457, 66 Pac. 714, in response to the contention of discrimination, it was said the primary laws construed, defining political parties on the percentage basis and excluding the smaller groups from participation in the primaries, could not possibly be classed as local or special laws within the constitutional inhibition against the grant of special privileges and immunities. The acts, it was said, were but reasonable regulations of the larger parties designed to safeguard the privileges of the electors thereof, and not infringements of the rights of the minor parties or individual voters, to whom the right was reserved to nominate by petition, which was held a reasonable regulation, and not violative of any constitutional right. The same principles are enunciated in Ledgerwood v. Pitts, 122 Tenn. 570, 125 S. W. 1036, and State, Ransom, Prosecutor, v. Black, 54 N. J. L. 446, 16 L.R.A. 769, 24 Atl. 489, 1021. It was so held in Maryland, where the Primary Law was limited in its benefits to the two parties casting the highest number of votes at the last general election. Kenneweg v. Allegany County, 102 Md. 119, 62 Atl. 249.

Nor does the classification assailed conflict with a constitutional guaranty of freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise. State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 776, 105 N. W. 174; State ex rel. Webber v. Felton, 77 Ohio St. 564, 84 N. E. 85, 12 Ann. Cas. 65. A statute of Ohio (Act April 18, 1892; 89 Ohio Laws, p. 434, § 6) provided that certified nominations of candidates for public office should be made by convention or primary election by political parties which, at the next preceding election, polled at least 1 per cent of the entire vote cast in the state. Apparently, no method was made available whereby lesser groups of voters might make and certify nominations. Yet, in State ex rel. Plimmer v. Poston, 58 Ohio St. 620, 42 L.R.A. 237, 51 N. E. 150, the law was held "not repugnant to any provision of the Constitution." "Some restriction upon the right to have nominations printed upon the blanket ballot is necessary to render it practicable." The right of a qualified elector to vote at all elections is not unreasonably impeded.

The election law of Pennsylvania (Act June 19, 1891; P. L. 350) provided that the nominations entitled to appear on the official ballots should be made either by the authorized nominating bodies of the political parties casting 3 per cent of the vote at the last election, or by papers signed by qualified electors to the number of one half of 1 per cent of the largest vote cast at the preceding election for any officer elected for the state at large if the nomination is for a state office, otherwise to the number of 3 per cent of the largest vote cast at the preceding election for any officer elected in that portion of the state for which the nomination is made. It was held, in De Walt v. Bartly, 146 Pa. 529, 15 L.R.A. 771, 28 Am. St. Rep. 814, 24 Atl. 185, that the law was not "in violation of the constitutional provisions that elections shall be free and equal, and that all laws regulating elections shall be uniform throughout the state." "While prescribing reasonable regulations, requisite to effect its object, it carefully preserves the right of each elector to vote for whom he pleases, without any unnecessary inconvenience." The court further said: "At the last general election the highest vote polled in this state was 790,040, and the vote cast for the Prohibition candidate was 18,429, . . . less than 3 per cent of the entire vote cast, and that under the provisions of the act a candidate nominated by the Prohibition party would not be entitled to have its ticket printed at the public expense, as in the case of the other two parties. It was contended that the provision or discrimination against the Prohibition party is in violation of that clause of the Constitution which declares that elections shall be free and equal, and . . . that all laws regulating the holding of elections by the citizens shall be uniform throughout the state; that these constitutional provisions were intended to secure to every citizen equality in the manner of voting, and to prohibit the legislature from passing any law which shall give, directly or indirectly, an advantage to some voters which will not equally apply to all voters. This contention is plausible, but unsound. The act does not deny to any voter the exercise of the elective franchise because he happens to be a member of a party which, at the last general election, polled less than 3 per cent of the entire vote cast. The provision referred to is but a regulation, and we think a reasonable one, in regard to the printing of tickets. The use of official ballots renders it absolutely necessary to make some regulations in regard to nominations, in order to ascertain what names shall be printed on the ballot. The right to vote can only be exercised by the individual voter. The right to nominate, flowing necessarily from the right to vote, can only be exercised by a number of voters acting together. Three persons may claim to be a political party, just as the three tailors of Tooley street assumed to be 'the people of England.' It follows, if an official ballot is to be used, nominations must be regulated in some way; otherwise the scheme would be impracticable, and the official ballot become the size of a blanket."

Again, in State ex rel. Fritz v. Jensen, 36 Minn. 19, 89 N. W. 1126, the court held valid, on the ground of differences in party conditions, a statute excluding from primary elections parties casting less than 10 per cent of the total vote at the last election for their leading candidates. In its opinion the court said: "While it seems to some of us that the percentage of the vote selected as the basis of the classification in this act is larger than necessary, yet it was a question for the legislature, and we are not justified in holding that the classification was arbitrary."

The supreme court of Wisconsin held, in State ex rel. McGrath v. Phelps, 144 Wis. 1, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353, 128 N. W. 1041, that, notwithstanding "the right of suffrage includes the right to form political parties, and the right of each party to have all the machinery, not reasonably prohibited by law, for making its organization effective as to the policy of its members, by electing officers in harmony therewith,"—principles for which the relators here contend,—and notwithstanding "constitutional inhibitions of legislative interference with the right to vote and rights incidental thereto, there is a legitimate field of legislative activity in the nature of regulation." Moreover, while denouncing as an unreasonable interference "a regulation which necessarily tends to afford one political party of substantial status a better opportunity for efficient existence than another, however large, or materially impair or prevent fair opportunity for any organization of voters of substantial numbers and standing to compete for favor," nevertheless "legislative regulations of the right to vote and rights incidental thereto are appropriate . . . to keep the ballot sheet within a reasonably workable compass, both from the standpoint of the party and individual right," not withstanding the express or implied constitutional inhibitions against class legislation, recognition of the existence and inviolability of inherent rights, and express guaranty of the right to vote. Therein was upheld as valid, because not an infringement of any constitutional guaranty, a requirement of a number equal to 20 per cent of the votes cast in the next preceding general election as a test of the competency of minor political organizations to have the use of the official Australian ballot system for their organic purposes.

So accordant with reason and principle, as we believe, is the doctrine of the case cited, and so responsive to the contentions of L.R.A.1917B.

the relators, that the liberal quotation therefrom seems justified. With the exception of California, no appellate court, so far as we can discover, has held unconstitutional percentage classifications of parties entitled to participate in primaries. Other jurisdictions uniformly sustain the validity thereof, noting generally the provision usually inserted for nominations of candidates by minor parties by conventions or by petitions containing signatures of the required number of electors voting in the preceding general election. Such a regulation renders competent nominations made as therein permitted, upon compliance with its terms, and is held uniformly by the cases herein cited to be reasonable and valid and an appropriate limitation upon the right claimed by relators.

Consonant with this approval regulation, the state Primary Law does make ample provision for the nomination of candidates by minor parties "otherwise than by direct primary election" (§ 23). Compliance therewith is made to depend only on certificates signed by 5 per cent of all the voters participating in the last general election within "the political division for which the candidate is presented." There is no limitation exclusively confining signatures to the membership of any particular party organization. By implication, any voter willing to affix his signature may do so, it would seem, without regard to his own party predilection. This mode of securing representation on the official ballots clearly was available to the adherents of the Prohibition party. If, for any reason satisfactory to them, they declined, or through inadvertence failed, to exercise the privilege or opportunity so offered, they cannot now reasonably be heard to assert the infringement of any right guaranteed to them by the Constitution of this state.

The writ is refused.

2. A statute requiring each voter in a primary election to state on oath his party affiliation before he is entitled to cast his ballot does not violate the constitutional provision that no "political test oath shall be required as a prerequisite or qualification to vote," or that, with certain negative exceptions, all male citizens twenty-one years of age or over "shall be entitled to vote at all elections held within the counties in which they respectively reside."

For other cases, see Elections, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same—purpose of requirement.

3. Such statutory requirement is only a mode of ascertaining the party affiliation of the voter, and thereby to identify him as one entitled to cast the ballot of such party, and is not intended as a test of his right to vote in a primary as distinguished from a general election.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Between Ira P. Baer and William Gore has arisen a controversy as to which of them received a plurality of votes cast in the June primary election for nomination as a candidate for justice of the peace of Logan district, Logan county, to be voted for in the general election to be held November 7, 1916. The returns of the election, as ascertained by the commissioners and clerks conducting it, and by the county court as a board of canvassers, showed a plurality in favor of Gore, while upon appeal the circuit court found Baer nominated as a candidate, and not Gore, who assigns error.

These findings resulted from variant interpretations of the section of the primary election law that requires each voter to state upon oath his party affiliations, his age and residence, etc., as a prerequisite to the right to exercise the elective franchise at the polling place where he offers himself as a voter in a primary. Section 26a (13), chap. 3, Barnes's Code. The section is: "On entering the election room, the voter shall announce his name, and if he is duly registered, or has obtained transfer as provided by law, he shall sign his name and place of residence in a book of the party whose ballot he wishes to cast, which book shall be paged alphabetically, and have at the top of the page thereof in form and effect the following oath or affirmation with blank spaces properly filled in as to the party and precinct as indicated: 'The undersigned do each for himself severally swear or affirm that I am a regular and qualified member and voter of the _____ party, and am a duly qualified resident and voter in precinct No. _____, _____ district, _____ county, West Virginia, and reside at the place designated opposite my name signed hereunder; that the one ballot which I am about to cast will be the only primary election ballot cast this day by me; that I have neither received, nor do I expect to receive, anything of value for myself or another, given or promised with the manifest intent to influence my vote or the vote of another or others at this time.' Having so signed, said voter shall be allowed to cast the ballot of the party named in said oath or affirmation."

The legal validity of this statute is in issue.

The election commissioners and the board of canvassers apparently interpreted the provision quoted as directory only, while the circuit court treated it as mandatory. This diversity constitutes the real cause of the controversy, although other questions arise as incidental to the main issues to be adjudged on the writ of review. The provisions of the enactment are expressed in imperative terms. They are positive and unequivocal.

Generally "shall," when used in Constitutions and statutes, leaves no way open for the substitution of discretion. 35 Cyc. 1451; L.R.A. 1917B.

Madderom v. Chicago, 194 Ill. 573, 62 N. E. 846; Coleman v. Eutaw, 157 Ala. 340, 47 So. 703; State ex rel. Folk v. Talty, 186 Mo. 559, 66 S. W. 361. All authorities coincide in holding mandatory all statutory requirements, although contained in an election law, if it appears reasonably certain the legislature intended them to have that effect. Morris v. Board of Canvassers, 49 W. Va. 282, 38 S. E. 500. This court in Daniel v. Simms, 49 W. Va. 554, 39 S. E. 690, interpreted as imperative a provision requiring each voter to place the names of all persons for whom he desired to vote in one column of the ballot and to designate the office to be filled by each of them. Hence it seems obvious that the legislature intended that each elector who offers to vote in a primary should declare his party affiliation as a condition of the right to express his preferences between the candidates of his own party for any political office.

One of the many reasons assigned and argued by counsel to show that a writ of error does not lie from this court to the circuit court, in proceedings of this nature, is that the value of a nomination for an office is less than $100. No value is alleged or proved; and, when measured by any recognized standard of pecuniary valuation, a nomination may not easily be appraised. But an exact appraisal of the subject matter of a controversy is not always indispensable. For an actual monetary value in excess of $100 is not essential to empower this court, on writ of error or appeal, to determine causes "involving the constitutionality of a law." Const. § 3, art. 8; Code, § 4, chap. 113, and § 1, chap. 135; Williamson v. Musick, 60 W. Va. 59, 53 S. E. 706; Underwood Typewriter Co. v. Piggett, 60 W. Va. 532, 55 S. E. 664. Of course, to be adjudged the right to invoke this jurisdiction, it must appear with reasonable certainty, as obviously in this case it does appear, that a correct interpretation and construction of the challenged statute is vital to a just determination of the litigation. These provisions manifest an intention to make this requirement essential to confer on this court power and right to determine, on writ of error or appeal, controversies between parties where the matter in dispute is less in value than the jurisdictional amount. Not every charge of infirmity in an enactment, however, will so operate. A mere factitious or spurious assertion of constitutional invalidity will not suffice. "The court will examine and determine for itself whether such claim is well founded; and, in order for jurisdiction to attach, it must affirmatively appear that a fairly debatable constitutional question was and is necessarily involved." 3 C. J. 391. That an interpretation of the provision requiring an oath of party affiliation, in view of the constitutional provisions found in § 11, art. 3, is vital to a correct solution of the questions herein involved, seems too obvious to permit of argument. The essential rights of the parties—those rights upon which the board of canvassers and the circuit court wholly disagreed—depend conclusively upon the legal validity of that requirement. It marks the point of divergence between the different results reached in ascertaining the returns from two precincts in Logan district, so far as can be discovered by an examination of the record.

Again, it is contended that the writ does not lie, because, although an appeal lies in such cases to the circuit court under the authority of the statute, it vests that court only with such power as, and no more than, the board of canvassers had and exercised, and that the action of both was ministerial. In support of this contention are cited Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Board of Public Works, 28 W. Va. 264, and Mackin v. Taylor County Ct. 38 W. Va. 338, 18 S. E. 632, holding that by no appellate process can this court review the action of inferior tribunals exercising merely ministerial or administrative functions; that, to be appealable, the action must essentially be judicial in nature. If sound, the proposition urged against the right denied or restricted applies with the same degree of consistency to the right conferred by the Primary Act on the circuit courts. On them is bestowed generally functions purely judicial. Nevertheless, they may and do act, under legislative authority, in matters not strictly judicial. If the legislature may clothe, and has clothed, circuit courts with power so to act, why may it not also confer the same authority on this court? But we may inquire whether a canvass by the circuit court of primary election returns, under authority of the statute, is purely ministerial or administrative in nature. Does it not possess the essential elements of a judicial function? An affirmative answer seems to be justified by the distinctions noted in some of our decisions in tax assessment proceedings. The two cases cited to sustain the argument referred to limit the power of circuit courts to review assessments made by assessors as revised by the county courts when apparently administrative. But an adjudication of the taxability of any species of property results from the exercise of a judicial function, though involved in a tax assessment proceeding. Hannis Distilling Co. v. County Ct. 62 W. Va. 442, 59 S. E. 1061. And, while conceding the administrative character of the acts performed in assessing property for taxation by an assessor, L.R.A.1917B.

and the review thereof by the county court, yet upon appeal by the party aggrieved, alleging illegality in the assessment, the action of the circuit court partakes of the nature of a judicial inquiry. State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 60, 24 S. E. 688. A circuit court acts judicially in determining whether property is assessable for the purpose of taxation, although the assessor, in making the assessment, and the board of review and equalization in reviewing his action, perform merely administrative functions. Copp v. State, 69 W. Va. 439, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 669, 71 S. E. 580. So that limitations on the powers granted by statute to agencies charged with performance of administrative or ministerial duties do not always necessarily operate to prescribe within the same limits the action of courts of record empowered to determine on review the correctness of the conclusions reached by the former; and, as regards the right to hear de novo and adjudge questions arising out of a primary election, it may well be doubted whether the legislature intended so to circumscribe such right of review.

Nor can the right of review on writ of error reasonably be denied on the ground that the legislature did not expressly authorize it. As later announced herein, a recanvass by the circuit court, under the statute providing therefor, partakes of the nature of a contest between rival claimants in an election for an office, and is to be governed and controlled by the same procedural regulations. When so considered and treated, both are contests and "controversies" within the contemplation of § 4, chap. 113 (§ 4592), and § 1, chap. 135 (§ 4981), Code. There was no special authorization regarding the right of review by this court in post election contests under § 3, chap. 6 (§ 200), Code. But if, as held in Williamson v. Muckick, 60 W. Va. 59, 53 S. E. 706, a contest for an office is reviewable here on writ of error, so is a contest for a nomination under § 26a22 of chap. 3. Both contain the essential elements of a controversy.

Passing to the assignments, it is argued that the circuit court erred in its adverse rulings on the motions severally made by Gore, who appeared specially for the purpose, to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the bond and notice required by chapter 6 of the Code were not given, and the record made by the board of canvassers was insufficient to warrant the appeal. To these rulings he timely excepted, as he also did to the action of the court on his objection to its hearing the controversy de novo. Baer gave neither notice nor bond. However, we are led to believe he did offer to execute the bond, but Gore later agreed not to insist upon it or to raise any objection for the want of it. This was, in effect, a waiver of that requirement, estopping him to take any advantage of the omission thereof.

The same conclusion seems warranted as to the notice, although for different reasons. "The action of the board of canvassers, or of any political committee, at any primary election, may be appealed from by any candidate thereat, to the circuit court of the county. All such contests shall be governed by the provisions of the Code of West Virginia, so far as the same are applicable, as found in chapter 6 thereof." Barnes's Code, § 26a22, chap. 3. Chapter 6 does, of course, contemplate a notice to set in motion contest proceedings. The apparent purpose is to advise the adverse party of the defects or irregularities relied on to show the particulars in respect of which the contestant claims an office denied to him as the result of a canvass of the votes cast therefor, and to designate the votes cast for him and not counted, or cast for his opponent and counted, which erroneously have been included in the count or excluded from it in numbers sufficient to work an alteration of the result favorable to him. But it is not of individual votes cast and not counted, but of the exclusion of the votes at two precincts of Logan district, deemed illegal because the electors entitled to vote thereat failed to designate their party affiliation as required by the Primary Law, that Gore complains. Both contestants knew this was the sole meritorious contention between them. They had that knowledge from the beginning. That was the chief cause of the subsequent proceedings, the obvious origin and basis of the divergent opinions expressed respecting the votes cast and counted or excluded for that reason. The essence of the inquiry was the power to ascertain the result by excluding the votes so cast. Upon that issue the case was heard and determined. Gore and Baer remained personally present during the progress of the canvass, and to the same extent participated therein. Thus it seems that every purpose to be served by a notice was accomplished without it; and no prejudice resulted so far as can be observed.

By the next objection, Gore challenged the right of the circuit court to hear the matter de novo. The statute amply clothes that court with authority so to hear and determine the results of a primary. Why it may not perform that function under the power given, no convincing argument asserts, and no sufficient answer suggests. By allowing an appeal, the legislature evidently intended to confer the jurisdiction exercised in contest cases between rival claimants of an office arising out of a general election, as required by § 3, chap. 6, Code, and to hear de novo and justly determine the actual results of the primary. The section authorizing an appeal denominates the appellate proceeding a contest, and points out the regulatory proceedings therefor. Apparently the act placed both controversies in the same category, and prescribed the same procedural regulations to govern the mode of ascertaining the rights of the claimants of a primary nomination and the contestants for an office.

The vital contention is the assault made upon the constitutionality of the act, requiring the voter to indicate by his oath his party affiliation before he is entitled to express by ballot a choice between candidates in the primary election. In this discussion, it must be remembered always that we are dealing exclusively with a primary election law, and not with the right to vote in a general election. That right is not in issue now. The elections are fundamentally different. In a primary the voters of each political organization participating are conceded the privilege to determine for themselves by ballot who shall be their candidates for the different elective offices. Although voting at the same place and time, for the same purpose, they vote only within the party with which they affiliate. No impropriety appears, and none is urged, against the classification of voters by parties in a nomination election.

Moreover, primary elections are so far matters of public concern that, within legislative discretion unrestrained by any provision of the organic law of the state, they are objects of proper and reasonable regulations in the exercise of governmental police power. Hopper v. Stack, 69 N. J. L. 562, 56 Atl. 1; Ladd v. Holmes, 40 Or. 167, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457, 66 Pac. 714; Ledgerwood v. Pitts, 122 Tenn. 594, 125 S. W. 1036; Hager v. Robinson, 154 Ky. 489, 157 S. W. 1138; Riter v. Douglass, 32 Nev. 400, 109 Pac. 444. Such regulations are vital to accomplish the apparent purpose and scheme of nomination elections. Classifications by parties are unavoidable. They are essential requirements. Courts universally uphold them as such. Primary election statutes are based on a recognition of political parties as governmental agencies, and are usually intended to maintain party organizations and to secure the integrity of their nominations. The adherents of each organization participating in a primary may join in selecting the candidates of his party for offices to be filled by the electors of all political parties at the succeeding general election; and, while he may finally determine to vote therein for one or more of the nominees of any other party, he cannot, with propriety, participate in nominating them. That is a privilege he has no inherent right to exercise, and of a denial thereof he cannot justly complain. These propositions are so fundamental as to be axiomatic. None but unreasonable partisans will controvert them. By many text-books and decisions an important distinction is noted between a general and a primary election. They treat a primary election merely as a substitute for a nominating caucus or convention, and not as an "election" within the meaning of that term as used in constitutions. So treated, it is a mere matter of statutory regulation within a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state, predicated on rights reserved by the people, when not forbidden by the organic law of the municipality. This principle is especially emphasized with reference to the qualifications of electors and tests of party membership prescribed by primary laws. Ledgerwood v. Pitts, 122 Tenn. 587, 125 S. W. 1036; Hanna v. Young, 84 Md. 179, 34 L.R.A. 55, 57 Am. St. Rep. 396, 35 Atl. 674; Montgomery v. Chelf, 118 Ky. 766, 82 S. W. 388; State ex rel. Webber v. Felton, 77 Ohio St. 554, 84 N. E. 85, 12 Ann. Cas. 65; Hager v. Robinson, 154 Ky. 480, 157 S. W. 1138; State ex rel. Zent v. Nichols, 50 Wash. 522, 97 Pac. 728; Riter v. Douglass, 32 Nev. 400, 109 Pac. 444; State ex rel. Gulden v. Johnson, 87 Minn. 223, 91 N. W. 604, 840; Line v. Election Canvassers, (Line v. Waite) 154 Mich. 329, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 412, 117 N. W. 730; Morrow v. Wipf, 22 S. D. 146, 115 N. W. 1121; Dooley v. Jackson, 104 Mo. App. 21, 78 S. W. 330; Gray v. Seitz, 162 Ind. 1, 69 N. E. 456; State ex rel. Miller v. Flaherty, 23 N. D. 313, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 132, 136 N. W. 76; State v. Woodruff, 68 N. J. L. 89, 52 Atl. 294; Kelso v. Cook, — Ind. —, 110 N. E. 987.

Finally, it is contended that the provision requiring each voter to state on oath the political organization with which he affiliates before he is entitled to vote in the primary violates the constitutional provisions that "no religious or political test oath shall be required as a prerequisite or qualification to vote," and that with certain negative exceptions all male citizens twenty-one years of age or over "shall be entitled to vote at all elections held within the counties in which they respectively reside." But is the requirement of the Primary Election Law of the political identification of the voter, verified by his signature and affidavit, in the nature of the test oath forbidden by the organic law? That identification is essential to effectuate the statute. Without that requirement, the law would be useless and inefficient. If electors can exercise the elective franchise in primaries indiscriminately, adverse partisans may dictate or procure the nomination of persons as candidates not desired by a majority of L.R.A.1917B.

the voters of a different party organization, and thereby impose upon it undesirable nominees. But such requirement is not a test oath. It is a reasonable regulation, operating as a reciprocal protection and security against imposition by the voters of one political organization upon the adherents of another. It does not tend to impair the elective franchise, or impinge upon any constitutional guaranty or inhibition. No one is denied the right to vote. It is merely a mode of ascertaining the party affiliation of the voter. It does not assume to test the right to vote, but to identify him with the party organization for whose candidates he desires to vote in the primary. As such it is upheld in Eadd v. Holmes, 40 Or. 167, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457, 66 Pac. 714; State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 776, 105 N. W. 174; Riter v. Douglass, 32 Neb. 400, 109 Pac. 444; State ex rel. Zent v. Nichols, 50 Wash. 522, 97 Pac. 728; Hopper v. Stack, 69 N. J. L. 562, 56 Atl. 1; Ex parte Wilson, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 624, 125 Pac. 739; Kelso v. Cook, — Ind. —, 110 N. E. 987; State ex rel. Miller v. Flaherty, 23 N. D. 313, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 132, 136 N. W. 76. As announced by these and other authorities, to prescribe reasonable regulations for exercising the elective franchise in primaries is within legislative power and competency. The statute assailed is not an unreasonable regulation. Frequently, to protect the integrity of the ballot, it is necessary to demand and require a voter to show by his oath a valid claim of right to vote in a general election. Statutes authorizing a denial of the right, except upon verified proof showing the requisite qualifications of the proposed voter, have never been assailed in this state as violative of the constitutional provisions now in force. Electors have acquiesced in the enforcement thereof as essential and valid, without objection or complaint.

These conclusions necessitate an affirmation of the judgment of which Gore complains.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RICHARD H. STAATS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

Corporations — dividend — right to rescind.

A declaration of dividend on corporate stock, to be paid in scrip certificates which might be converted into cash, stock, or interest-bearing obligations, may be rescinded by the directors before the scrip is issued if adverse conditions affect the business, although enough surplus remains to satisfy the dividend.

(July 3, 1916.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the rescission of a resolution by defendant declaring a dividend on its corporate stock. Affirmed.

Statement by Rogers, Circuit Judge:

The defendant is a corporation organized in 1895, pursuant to the laws of the state of New Jersey. It has an authorized capital of $2,000,000, and of this amount $1,999,000 is outstanding, and is engaged in the moving picture business.

The plaintiff is a citizen of the state of New York, and is the record owner of 550 shares of the par value of $55,000 of the stock of the defendant company, and has been since prior to January 1, 1913.

On December 28, 1914, the board of directors of defendant declared a dividend of 50 per cent on its outstanding capital stock, payable February 1, 1915, to the stockholders of record of January 18, 1915. The dividend as declared was payable February 1, 1915. It was to be paid in registered scrip certificates containing upon their face an agreement by the defendant that they might be converted on or before December 31, 1916, at par, without interest, wholly or partly in cash, wholly or partly at par, or wholly or partly in such form of interest-bearing obligation as might be deemed by the directors to be the best interests of the company. Announcement of this action was made in a circular to the stockholders, dated December 28, 1914.

Without authorization from the stockholders and on August 10, 1915, and without the plaintiff's consent, the directors passed a resolution rescinding the declaration of the dividend previously declared, and this action was announced in a circular to the stockholders dated August 26, 1915.

On September 14, 1915, the plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for the delivery of the registered scrip certificates which he claimed pursuant to the resolution of December 28, 1914. The demand was not complied with, and this action is brought to recover $27,500; that being the face amount of the scrip certificates which were issuable to him in respect of the $55,000 par value of the stock held by him. At the close of the trial of the action a motion was made to dismiss the complaint. That motion was denied. Both sides asked the court to direct a verdict, and a verdict was directed for the defendant; an exception being reserved for the plaintiff.

Argued before Coxe, Ward, and Rogers, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Van Vorst, Marshall, & Smith, and Alexander B. Siegel for plaintiff in error:

A dividend, when declared, becomes an absolute obligation, owing by the corporation to the stockholder; and it follows that since it is such an absolute obligation, its binding force cannot be destroyed by the party from whom it is owing.

Baltimore & O. R. Co.* 6 Gill, 363.

Rogers, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question involved herein concerns the power of a board of directors of a corporation to rescind a resolution declaring a scrip dividend, after the resolution declaring the dividend has been announced, and notwithstanding the existence of a surplus at the time of the adoption of both resolutions. It is conceded that no dispute as to the facts exists. The decision below was limited by its terms to a decision against the plaintiff on questions of law alone.

Prior to 1913, the defendant company had paid cash dividends at the rate of 12 per cent annually; but on February 28, 1913, the directors decided to reduce the rate to 6 per cent annually.

The company had purchased land in the Bronx borough in New York City, upon which it proposed to construct a new plant. The reduction in the dividend was for the purpose of facilitating the completion and equipment of this new plant. On December 31, 1912, the company had a surplus of $831,149 after deducting a reserve for depreciation. All of this surplus was profit earned by the company in excess of dividends paid to the stockholders. The balance sheet of the company on June 30, 1915, shows that there was on that day a profit and loss surplus of $1,101,696.83. The evidence shows that at the end of every month during the year of 1915 the surplus always was in excess of $1,000,000. Nevertheless on August 10, 1915, the board adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the action taken at the meeting of the board of directors held December 28, 1914, declaring a scrip dividend of fifty (50) per cent, be and the same is hereby rescinded."

It is not claimed that the corporation had, between the time of the declaration of the dividend and its rescission, suffered any unforeseen or material loss. All the surplus which existed when the resolution declaring the 50 per cent scrip dividend was passed still existed when the revoking resolution was adopted, and in fact at the time the latter resolution was passed the surplus had been somewhat increased above what it was when the original declaration was made, and at no time since has it fallen below $1,000,000.

But it appears that, intermediate the passage of the resolution declaring the dividend, December 28, 1914, and its rescission, August 10, 1915, the business of the company was seriously affected by the European War. Conditions had so changed that the officers of the company voluntarily consented that their salaries should be reduced. On his own request the president's expense allowance of $7,500 per annum was discontinued, and his salary, which had been $18,750 a year, was reduced to $15,000. The company had to borrow cash from its directors to meet its needs. The operating expenses of the company were about $50,000 a week. A few days prior to the adoption of the rescinding resolution, it borrowed from its president $27,000, who, with others, accepted the notes of the company unsecured by any collateral.

The president testified that "at the time the dividend was declared, the business had fallen off considerably, but it was believed from the best information obtainable that it would be only temporary shrinkage. Early in the following year, or say in the spring of the following year, the business fell off very rapidly, until it now amounts to practically nothing. There was also at the same time a very serious change in the business of this country and Canada. There were certain facts which the directors considered at their meeting of December 28, 1914, which were very encouraging and looked like a substantial change for the better. But within a very few months the reverse began to take place."

He was asked: "You had difficulty in getting your films across into countries that are in war?"

And he replied: "Well, we had more difficulty in getting orders. Formerly we would send a small positive print abroad of each production. That would be shown to the buyers on the other side, not only for European markets, but also for Australia. They would order on samples and on a certain day they would cable to ship so many positives. That meant that they ordered two or more weeks in advance of the time required. Later on conditions changed to such an extent that the various buyers would not place their orders more than a few days in advance of the time required for delivery, and we were obliged to ship machinery to the other side and hold our negatives here until we made all the positives we could sell or lease in the American and Canadian markets. Then we shipped the negatives to the other side, and had the positive prints made there, so that we could accept orders up to leaving less than twenty-four hours before the time required for delivery. That was a very serious change. Furthermore, the duty imposed was so great,—the duty requirements put in force by the Canadian government,—that our agent, the man who represents us in all foreign countries, cabled us to suspend all shipments even of positives. By that time the business ceased entirely."

The resolution of rescission was adopted after many hours of discussion of the American and of the foreign market.

No scrip dividend has been paid to a single stockholder, and apparently all the stockholders with the exception of this plaintiff have acquiesced in the action of the directors. If this action can be maintained and the plaintiff can recover the damages he sues for, and other stockholders insist on like payments to them, it will require approximately $1,000,000,—an amount which probably could only be realized by converting this company's fixed assets into cash and winding up its business. The question presented is one of considerable importance, and has received careful consideration.

This seems to be an attempt on the part of a single stockholder to dictate to a directorate and to compel it, against its will and honest judgment, to pay a dividend to him in cash or stock. The general rule is well established that, when a corporation has a surplus, whether a dividend shall be made rests in the fair and honest discretion of the directors, uncontrollable by the courts. Williams v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 N. Y. 162; Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 565, 34 L. ed. 525, 529, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057 (1890).

There have been numerous attempts to induce courts to interfere with directors in the exercise of their discretion, but they have quite uniformly refused to do so, unless it appeared that the directors had willfully abused their discretion and acted in bad faith and in neglect of duty. It takes a very strong case to induce a court to order directors to declare a dividend. A court has no jurisdiction to do so unless fraud or a breach of trust is involved. 2 Cook, Corp. 7th ed. § 545, p. 1588.

In the case at bar there is nothing to lead us to doubt the perfect honesty and good faith of this board of directors, and the soundness of their judgment in this matter. But this plaintiff is not in this court asking us to compel the board of directors to declare a dividend. He is here, he asserts, because the board has declared the dividend and announced it, and then recalled its action and rescinded the vote.

In proper cases courts protect minorities, even minorities of one, against the oppression of the majority of stockholders and of boards of directors. It sometimes happens, however, that a minority institute "strike" suits and seek to oppress majorities and to involve the corporation itself in disaster for purposes of their own and for reasons not always revealed. So that there are cases in which courts are compelled to protect minorities against majorities and majorities against minorities.

In this case it does not escape observation that the plaintiff's right to a stock dividend, if he has such a right and can enforce it, would gain him nothing. We say it would gain him nothing, because, while a stock dividend would increase the number of his shares, it proportionately diminishes the value of each of his shares, leaving the aggregate value as it was before. He acquires the ownership of more shares, but he adds nothing to his proportionate ownership of the assets of the corporation. Green v. Bissell, 79 Conn. 547, 555, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, 118 Am. St. Rep. 156, 65 Atl. 1056, 9 Ann. Cas. 287 (1907). What he expects through this suit is not the stock, but the cash value of the stock. But the question which this court must pass upon, whatever the consequences in this particular case may be, is whether a board of directors, having declared the dividend in the form already stated, had the power to rescind its action.

We may, however, remark in passing that while it might be very disastrous to the welfare of the defendant, under the circumstances in which it now finds itself, if any large number of its stockholders could come into a court of law as this plaintiff has done and enforce the demand that they receive the value of the stock dividend as declared, yet the corporation might easily have avoided any such situation. For we confess our inability to see how the corporation or its stockholders could in the least degree have been prejudiced if the scrip dividend had been issued as originally voted, and the corporation had then elected to pay it in stock. The property of the corporation would not have been impaired in the slightest extent.

The right to reconsider the declaration of a dividend would seem to depend upon the circumstances under which the dividend was declared, as well as upon the character of the dividend itself.

1. If a board of directors, for example, should declare a dividend, and, before any public announcement of the action has been made, should reconsider the vote and rescind the action, its right to do so, perhaps, could not successfully be challenged.

2. If a board of directors should declare a dividend, when there are, at the time the declaration is made, no profits to divide, and if public announcement of the declaration of the dividend should be made, it may be that the right to reconsider and rescind would not be denied. Until such a dividend is paid, there would seem to be a locus penitentiæ, and the directors might recall their ultra vires act. They would not be under any obligation to consummate an illegal act which is merely in fieri. 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2135.

3. But if a board of directors should declare a cash dividend and make a public announcement of the fact, the courts have held that thereafter the board has no right to reconsider and rescind its action. The reason seems to be that the declaration of the dividend sets apart from the profits of the corporation a sum which is to be paid to the stockholders in proportion to their shares, and that it creates a debt due from the corporation to each shareholder, resulting in the relation of debtor and creditor. A dividend divides the property which belongs to the corporation into that which the corporation retains and that which the corporation agrees to pay to the stockholders, and which it is thereby bound to pay. That which one person is bound to pay to another is a debt. Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 78, 18 Am. Rep. 156 (1875). Such a dividend cannot be rescinded, because a debtor does not have it within his power to "rescind" his debt. Beers v. Bridgeport Spring Co. 42 Conn. 17 (1875); McLaran v. Crescent Planing Mill Co. 117 Mo. App. 40, 50, 93 S. W. 819 (1906); King v. Patterson & H. R. Co. 29 N. J. L. 82, 87 (1860); Ford v. Easthampton Rubber Thread Co. 158 Mass. 84, 20 L.R.A. 65, 35 Am. St. Rep. 462, 32 N. E. 1036 (1893); 2 Cook, Corp. 7th ed. § 541, p. 1580. And sometimes the corporation becomes not merely a debtor, but is a trustee; as where the corporation has not only declared a dividend, but has deposited a fund out of which the dividends are to be paid. Le Roy v. Globe Ins. Co. 2 Edw. Ch. 657 (1836); Van Dyck v. McQuade, 86 N. Y. 38, 52 (1881). A trust relation, having been established, cannot be terminated at the pleasure of the board of directors by a vote rescinding its former action.

In Taylor on Corporations, 5th ed. § 568, it is said that "the discretion of the corporate management is exhausted in declaring the dividend; thereupon their only function is to pay it to the stockholders."

So in Machen on Modern Law of Corporations, vol. 2, § 1358, that writer says: "As a dividend when declared becomes a debt of the company, it follows that a dividend once properly declared cannot be revoked."

Morawetz, in his book on Private Corporations, vol. 1, § 445, says that "a dividend properly declared by the directors of a corporation cannot subsequently be revoked; those persons who were shareholders on the books of the company at the time when the dividend was declared have a legal claim against the company for the payment of the amount of the dividend."

And in Marshall on Corporations, § 283, it is said: "Since the right of the stockholders of a corporation to a dividend becomes vested as soon as the dividend has been fully declared by the directors, and the corporation becomes their debtor for their respective shares, it follows that neither the same board of directors nor their successors can afterwards reconsider their action and revoke the declaration without the stockholders' consent."

4. A difference seems to exist between a cash dividend and a stock dividend, so that, if a board of directors declare a stock dividend, the authorities appear to recognize the right of the board subsequently to rescind its action at any time prior to the actual issuance of the stock.

The leading case on the subject is that of Terry v. Eagle Lock Co. 47 Conn. 141 (1879). It appears in that case that at a meeting of stockholders of the defendant company held on August 5, 1875, it was voted to increase the capital stock 2,000 shares, and that the said increase be out of the surplus earnings of the company. It was at the same time voted that the directors be authorized and directed to cause the stock to be issued to the present stockholders pro rata. On August 18, 1875, a specially called stockholders' meeting was held, and a vote was passed rescinding the vote of August 5th, increasing the capital stock. The plaintiff stockholder, who had not been present at the meeting at which the former vote was rescinded, asked to have his pro rata share of the increase issued to him, or the value thereof paid to him, claiming that by the first vote he had a vested right of which he could not be deprived by the subsequent rescission. The court, in referring to the alternative prayer in the plaintiff's petition asking for a proportionate part of the supposed increase of stock or the cash value of his proportion of the increase, declared it very clear that the alternative prayer ought not to be granted, as it would in effect be making it a cash dividend,—something "the company never intended. It would withdraw from the working funds of the company that amount which would not have been the result had the stock dividend been carried into effect. It is in effect asking the court to make a dividend instead of enforcing one made by the company." The Connecticut court denied, also, the stockholders' right to compel the company to issue the stock certificates, and it clearly pointed out the difference existing between a cash and a stock dividend. In the course of its opinion the court said:

"There is a difference, however, between a cash and a stock dividend. The former is created by a simple vote of the directors, and the amount thereby becomes severed from the general fund and belongs to the stockholders pro rata. The latter can be initiated only by a vote of the stockholders. That is followed by issuing the stock, and the increase can only be completed legally by filing with the town clerk and with the secretary of the state the certificates required by law. Suppose the vote had been to increase, not from the surplus earnings, but by a sale of the newly created stock. In such a case, it cannot be said that the capital is actually increased until the new stock is subscribed for at least. Until then there is an element of uncertainty about it. It may never be taken. It is very clear that the vote to increase is not per se an increase. Nor is it such where the increase contemplated is from the surplus earnings.

"Again, a cash dividend entitles the stockholder to so much money, the ordinary way in which he receives from time to time the fruits of his investment. Such dividends do not materially affect the value of the stock. A stock dividend is exceptional. It does not add to his ready cash, but it changes the form of his investment by increasing his number of shares, thereby diminishing the value of each share, leaving the aggregate value of all his stock substantially the same. It is of no special importance whether that value be divided into few or many shares.

"These differences are somewhat material, and serve to show that the petitioner's right, if he has such a right, to an increase of the number of his shares, was at the time a mere nominal right, and one which possessed no appreciable pecuniary value. It is at least doubtful whether a court of equity will in any case aid in enforcing such a right. But however this may be, there are other reasons of a pretty substantial character why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

"The petitioner's right, as we have seen, was a mere naked right which he might waive without losing anything, and might enforce, if it could be enforced, without gaining anything. It became a mere question of expediency,—shall the surplus be actually converted into capital, or remain surplus and be used as capital? The corporation chose the latter; and the petitioner, having nothing to gain or lose in either case, acquiesced in that decision."

In Dock v. Schlichter Jute Cordage Co. 187 Pa. 370, 379, 31 Atl. 656 (1895), a stock dividend was declared on July 16, 1890, and on March 16, 1891, it was rescinded. The court held that a resolution adopted by the directors of a corporation distributing among the shareholders shares of stock of the company which had been purchased by the company out of its earnings cannot be subsequently rescinded where it is not shown that such distribution would be injurious to the business of the company. It was said that if, upon the declaration of a dividend, the company deposited the moneys to pay the dividends with a banker, and drew its check to the order of each entitled on the fund so deposited, or, in the case of a stock dividend, if the company executed its power of attorney to transfer the shares and these awaited delivery, the stockholder's right would be a vested one which could not be taken from him by a rescinding vote of the directors. Then followed this statement: "It is believed that, when there has been no such appropriation as that above mentioned, a company, by its board of directors, in a proper case and for cause, may rescind a resolution declaring a dividend; as where owing to destruction of a plant by fire immediately following such resolution. If in the business and honest judgment of the board the earnings intended to be distributed should be recalled and used for the restoration of the destroyed property it would be within its power to so deal with them; but, unless some similar thing appear, the declaration of a dividend of earnings is the announcement of an obligation due each shareholder for which proceedings may be had as legal methods indicate, and the burden of manifesting that the debt or obligation is not due after such a declaration is upon the company."

In the above case the court wrote no opinion, but affirmed "on the clear, concise, and convincing report of the master."

In Billingham v. E. P. Gleason Mfg. Co. 101 App. Div. 476, 91 N. Y. Supp. 1046, the directors passed a resolution providing for a regular cash dividend and for a scrip dividend. The scrip certificates were issued, and the court held that they constituted an indebtedness. An action was brought on one of them against the company, and the court held the action maintainable; and in speaking of the certificate the court said: "It was so much set apart and reserved for him as undivided earnings. His share was ascertained and his right to it was fixed. It was a divided share of past earnings, and, as we think, became a severed indebtedness of the company; for nothing is better understood than that a dividend when declared is a debt due absolutely to the stockholders."

In the case at bar the scrip certificates were never issued.

In Machen on Modern Law of Corporations, vol. 1, § 601, the law is stated as follows: "Rescission of Stock Dividends.—A stock dividend should also be distinguished from a cash dividend, in that, in the case of cash dividend, the right of the shareholder becomes indefeasible immediately upon the declaration of the dividend, and the company cannot subsequently rescind its action. In the case of a stock dividend, on the other hand, until the formalities required by law as conditions precedent to an increase of capital have been completed, all is in fieri, so that until then the company may revoke the dividend. The reason of this rule applies, however, only where the stock dividend involves an increase of the company's nominal capital, and therefore a dividend payable in shares which had been purchased by the company should be in this respect assimilated to a cash dividend and is irrevocable."

It is undoubtedly true that directors may repeal any previous resolution or rescind any previous action unless repeal or rescission would involve a breach of contract or disturb a vested right. The resolution originally adopted by the directors certainly created no debt. The declaration was not to pay a cash dividend absolutely, for the directors had an option which they reserved as to whether they would or would not pay in cash. The distinguishing and necessary feature of a "debt" is that a fixed and specific amount is owing by a certain and express agreement, and that does not exist under the circumstances we find in this case. The directors did not bind themselves to pay a cash dividend absolutely, and in all events, and if they should ultimately elect to pay in cash, they were left free to determine how much should be in cash and how much should be in stock. And as to the declaration as to the stock dividend, it should be said that the whole matter rested in fieri, and, not having become obligatory, was subject to repeal.

Notwithstanding the fact that the resolution declaring the dividend reserved to the corporation an option to pay in cash or to pay in stock, the plaintiff demands $27,500, the amount he would be entitled to receive if the dividend were paid in cash. But the law is well settled that where one is bound by covenants to do one of two things, and does neither, then, in an action by the covenantee, the measure of damages is in general the loss arising by reason of the covenantor having failed to do that which is least, not that which is most beneficial to the covenantee; and the courts of equity have applied the same principle to the case of a trustee failing to invest in either of two modes equally lawful by the terms of the trust. See Robinson v. Robinson, 1 De G. M. & G. 247, 42 Eng. Reprint, 547, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 111, 16 Jur. 255.

It would seem that, if the resolution declaring the dividend could be held in law to have created a contractual obligation, then, as an option was reserved, the corporation would have the right to insist that its liability should be restricted to damages for its failure to do that which is least beneficial to the promisee. In this case that would be to restrict its liability to the damages which arose from the failure to issue the stock dividend; and according to the decision in Terry v. Eagle Lock Co. 47 Conn. 141 (1879) the right to the stock dividend is a "mere naked right which he might waive without losing anything, and might enforce, if it could be enforced, without gaining anything." At the most, the damage would be nominal. If the defendant had performed, the complainant simply would have had the number of his shares of stock increased, and the value of each share in the same proportion decreased.

The action taken by the directors on December 28, 1914, which declared the scrip dividend and which was subsequently repealed, as already stated, declared a dividend payable on February 1, 1915, in registered scrip certificates containing upon their face an agreement by the company that they should be converted on or before December 31, 1916, at par without interest, wholly or partly in cash, wholly or partly in stock at par, or wholly or partly in such form of interest-bearing obligation as might be deemed by the directors to be for the best interest of the company. This is not a suit in equity to compel specific performance and the issuance of the scrip certificates, but it is an action at law for damages for the failure to perform the agreement and issue the registered scrip certificates payable on February 1, 1915. The L.R.A.1917B.

suit was not brought until October, 1915. Nevertheless the defendant claims that the action was prematurely brought. The basis for this contention is that while the scrip certificates were to be issued on February 1, 1915, the holders of such certificates were not entitled under the express language of the resolution to demand either cash or stock on them from the corporation until December 31, 1916, unless the corporation chose prior to that date to honor them, and that even on the latter date the corporation would have an option to pay in cash or stock as it might deem best. Has the corporation lost its rights to determine whether to pay in cash or stock on that date by its rescission of that contract prior to that time, assuming that a contract existed? We shall not at length review the cases relating to anticipatory breaches of executory contracts. The doctrine concerning anticipatory breaches was announced in Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678, 118 Eng. Reprint, 922, 22 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 465, 17 Jur. 972, 1 Week. Rep. 469, where Lord Campbell held that the man who wrongfully renounced a contract into which he had entered could not justly complain if he was immediately sued for a compensation in damages without awaiting the time when the contract was by its terms to be performed. And in Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 44 L. ed. 953, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780 (1900), the cases in England and in this country were reviewed, and the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Fuller, laid down the law in similar terms. But while the law is undoubted now that the doctrine announced in the cases above referred to is applicable to certain classes of contracts, still the courts do not agree that the doctrine is applicable to all classes of contracts. In a recent case in the court of appeals in New York, that court declares that the rule that renunciation of a continuous executory contract by one party before the day of performance gives the other the right to sue at once for damages is usually applied only to contracts of a special character. Ga Nun v. Palmer, 202 N. Y. 483, 493, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 922, 96 N. E. 99 (1911). And in Kelly v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. 186 N. Y. 16, 19, 78 N. E. 584, 9 Ann. Cas. 661 (1906), the New York court of appeals declared that the doctrine "is not generally applied to contracts for the payment of money at a future time."

We do not, however, pass on this question as to the right to sue for an anticipatory breach, for, in our opinion, there was in this case no contract to be breached.

Decree affirmed.

Annotation—Power of corporation to rescind declaration of dividend.

The general question of the right to reconsider a vote in a stockholders' or directors' meeting is discussed in the note to State ex rel. Springs v. Ellison, L.R.A.—, —.

The declaration of a cash dividend severs the amount thereof from the corporate funds and makes it the individual property of the stockholders; thenceforth the corporation owes the stockholders a debt;<sup>1</sup> the provision that it is to be paid at such time as directed by the board does not absolve the company from this obligation to the stockholder.<sup>2</sup> Since the declaration of a cash dividend creates a debt, such a dividend declared by the directors of a corporation cannot be rescinded as against nonassenting shareholders, even though the only action taken is the declaration thereof, no fund having been set aside out of which the dividend is to be paid when due,<sup>3</sup> or if it is ordered to be placed pro rata to the credit of the stockholders upon its books, to be paid at such time as may be directed by the board.<sup>4</sup> It is stated that "if the declaration of the dividend is fairly and properly made, out of profits existing at the time it is declared, the relation of debtor and creditor is thereby established between the corporation and the stockholders and a debt is thereby created against the corporation and in favor of the stockholder for the amount of the dividends due on the stock held by him.

... The mere declaration of the dividend, without more, by competent authority, under proper circumstances, creates a debt against the corporation in favor of the stockholder the same as any other general creditor of the concern; where as the setting apart of a fund after or concurrent with the declaration out of which the debt thus created is to be paid passes one step further towards securing the payment of the identical fund to the shareholder, inasmuch as the law treats the setting apart of such fund as payment to the corporation as trustee for the use of the stockholder, on which fund the stockholder has a lien, and to which fund he has rights superior to the general creditor. . . . The doctrine is that by the mere declaration, the dividend becomes immediately thereby separated and segregated from the stock and exists independently of it; that the right thereto becomes at once immediately fixed and absolute in the stockholder, and from thenceforth the right of each individual stockholder is changed by the act of declaration from that of partner and part owner of the corporate property to a status absolutely adverse to every other stockholder and to the corporation itself, in so far as his pro rata proportion to the dividend is concerned. . . . It follows, of course, that a cash dividend properly and fairly declared cannot be revoked by the subsequent action of the corporation, for if, by the declaration of the dividend, the corporation thereby becomes the debtor of the stockholder, it goes without saying that the debtor cannot revoke, recall, or rescind the debt or otherwise absolve itself from its payment by any action on its part against or without the consent of the creditor."<sup>5</sup>

In one case it has been held that a resolution of the board of directors to distribute among its shareholders shares of the corporation's own stock purchased by it out of its earnings cannot be rescinded where nothing in the affairs of the company require such rescission.<sup>6</sup> be carried to an account to be known as a surplus fund account, thus in effect rescinding the declaration of the dividend, a non-assenting shareholder was held entitled to equitable relief to compel the corporation to pay over the dividend, the court stating that although no time was fixed for the payment of the dividend, the legal effect of the vote was that the debt was to be paid within a reasonable time.

<sup>6</sup> Dock v. Schlichter Jute Cordage Co. (1895) 167 Pa. 370, 31 Atl. 656. It was claimed by the directors in this case that the distribution was made to enable the sale and transfer of the corporate property. The resolution directing the transfer recited that there was in the treasury

If the fact that the dividend has been declared has not been made public, or in any manner communicated to the stockholders, and no fund has been set apart for its payment, it has been held that the declaration of a dividend payable at a future time may be rescinded at a subsequent meeting held before the dividend becomes payable.<sup>7</sup> The court argues: "As the passage of the vote did not constitute an actual contract of the corporation with its stockholders, but was merely a mode of dividing the earnings of the property of the corporation among the stockholders, we are of opinion that before the division had been actually made, and before the position of the stockholders had been changed in reliance on the vote,—certainly before the passage of the vote had been made public or communicated to the stockholders,—it was within the power of the directors at a meeting subsequent to that at which the vote was passed to rescind it."

And it has been held that the declaration of an interim dividend may be rescinded by the directors where the circumstances of the company make it advisable to do so. This is true although the money intended for the payment of the dividend had been lodged with the bankers of the company and set aside by them under a special account entitled "interim dividend account."<sup>8</sup>

If, subsequent to the resolution rescinding the declaration of a dividend another resolution is passed declaring another and distinct dividend, in which it is expressly provided that the same is to be in lieu of the former dividend, a stockholder who accepts payment of the latter dividend with knowledge of and in accordance with the terms of the last-mentioned resolution is estopped from claiming payment of the first dividend.<sup>9</sup>

The declaration of a stock dividend may be rescinded; this is true even though it is made from surplus earnings.<sup>10</sup> In discussing the distinction between a cash dividend and a stock dividend one court states that "a cash dividend entitles the stockholder to so much money, the ordinary way in which he receives from time to time the fruits of his investment. Such dividends do not materially affect the value of the of the company the shares of stock representing undivided profits, and it was deemed advisable to divide the stock and distribute it among the stockholders. The court states that it may be admitted that the purpose of the resolution was to divide the stock so as to enable a transfer of the property, but this was not inconsistent with the further purpose indicated in the resolution. See citation from this case in STARRS v. BIOGRAPH Co. ante, 728.

The court in McLaran v. Crescent Planing Mill Co. (Mo.) supra, referring to Ford v. Easthampton Rubber Thread Co. (Mass.) supra, states that "the decision of that case can only be sustained upon the theory that the declaration of the dividend did not create a debt to the stockholders, for if a debt was thereby created, it is preposterous to say that such debt can be canceled by the action of the debtor without the consent of the creditor. In fact, we understand the opinion, inasmuch as it is there asserted that 'the passage of the vote did not constitute an actual contract of the corporation with the stockholder' as holding that the declaration of the dividend did not create a debt; and if this be its holding, it stands out boldly, singly, and alone in this country against an unbroken line of cases and overwhelming weight of authority that we are not at liberty to disregard were we so inclined, and we are not."

85 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 22, 17 Times L. R. 625. The rescission of the dividend was acquiesced in by the shareholder. At least, there was no evidence that any of the shareholders objected to it. An interim dividend is not an absolute declaration of dividends, but is a payment on account of the next forthcoming dividend.

<sup>9</sup> Albany Fertilizer & Farm Improv. Co. v. Arnold (1897) 103 Ga. 145, 29 S. E. 695. A part of the resolution declaring a subsequent dividend recited the illegality of the former dividend on account of want of funds, and expressly made the payment and acceptance of the last dividend to be in lieu of the former one declared.

<sup>10</sup> Terry v. Eagle Lock Co. (1879) 47 Conn. 141. The resolution declaring a stock dividend out of the surplus earnings of the company was made at a stockholders' meeting for a special purpose, and was assented to by the petitioner; the special purpose having failed, the stockholders met, pursuant to a notice, and passed a vote rescinding the declaration of the stock dividends. The petitioner was not present at this meeting and received no actual notice of it. No certificate of the increase was ever filed in the office of the secretary of state or in the office of the town clerk, as required for the completion of an increase in capital stock. A further reason for denying relief in this case was the delay on the part of the petitioner for a considerable time, within which a large amount of stock had changed hands on the basis of the validity of the rescission.

stock. A stock dividend is exceptional. It does not add to his ready cash, but it changes the form of his investment by increasing his number of shares, thereby diminishing the value of each share, leaving the aggregate value of all his stock substantially the same. It is of no special importance whether that value be divided into few or many shares." 11

And see STAATS v. BIOGRAPH CO. ante, 728.

It thus appears that a distinction exists between the right to rescind the declaration of a cash and a stock dividend; in the case of a cash dividend there being no right to rescind the declaration, save in the exceptional cases above mentioned, while in the case of a stock dividend this right is held to exist. This conclusion of the courts seems to be a correct application of the governing principles.

There are, however, some considerations of a practical nature which seem to suggest a reversal of the rule; at least, to the extent of permitting a rescission of the declaration of a cash dividend at any time before it becomes payable. The corporate assets must necessarily be reduced by so much as is paid out in cash dividends. Assuming that the dividends are properly declared out of profits, circumstances may arise subsequent to the declaration that make the payment of so much money as is represented by the dividends inadvisable; while the issuance of a stock dividend would not affect the assets of the corporation. Hence, to deny the right to rescind in the case of a cash dividend and permit rescission in case of a stock dividend is to deny the right to take action in the only case in which it can be beneficial to the corporation.

11 Terry v. Eagle Lock Co. (Conn.) supra.

The reason for holding that a stock dividend may be rescinded is well stated in an obiter statement in McLaran v. Crescent Planing Mill Co. (1906) 117 Mo. App. 40, 93 S. W. 819, as follows: "That inasmuch as the act of declaring the cash dividend not only creates a debt, but thereupon severs the amount thereof from the mass of the corporate funds and property, and cannot be recalled for the reason the debtor cannot cancel a debt and rehabilitate or re-establish the fruit on the tree, so figuratively referred to in the case supra; whereas the act of declaring a stock dividend does not of itself operate to sever the stock to be thereafter issued from the other corporate property, inasmuch as there is no stock to be severed, and as the new stock cannot be issued until certain precedent conditions and formalities are complied with, such as issuing stock, the filing of certificates with the proper authority, etc."

In an action to enforce the individual liability of a stockholder a defense set up by him that certain of his shares were issued to him as a stock dividend when there were no profits out of which such a dividend could properly be declared, and subsequently the board of directors rescinded the resolution directing such increase of capital and stock dividends, and that he has been at all times ready and willing to surrender his certificate to the company, was held a good defense, the court stating that the act of rescission operated to annul the previous illegal action of the board and cancel the certificate which had been issued, so that the holder thereof could not be held to any liability upon or by virtue of the shares thus issued to him and afterwards annulled. Hollingshead v. Woodward (1885) 35 Hun (N. Y.) 410, disposed of on appeal on another point (1887) 107 N. Y. 96, 13 N. E. 621.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

B. LINCOLN TEAGUE, Appt.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(172 Ky. 665, 189 S. W. 908.)

Perjury — acquittal of criminal charge — effect.

1. Acquittal of one charged with crime is no bar to a prosecution for perjury for testimony given by him at the trial.

For other cases, see Perjury, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — For acquittal of crime as bar to a subsequent prosecution of defendant for perjury committed on the former trial, see ANNOTATION following this case, post, 743. L.R.A.1917B.

Appeal — time for argument in lower court.

2. The appellate court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court as to the time allowed for argument of a case, unless it plainly appears that its discretion has been abused to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the complaining party.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. i, 6, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Criminal law — sentence — law governing.

3. Punishment for crime must be imposed under an indeterminate sentence law in force when it was committed, although it was repealed before the trial.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, IV. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(December 12, 1916.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hopkins County convicting him of false swearing. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gordon & Gordon & Moore, for appellant:

If the defendant was acquitted in the police court and if he swore falsely, this prosecution cannot stand.

Cooper v. Com. 106 Ky. 909, 45 L.R.A. 216, 90 Am. St. Rep. 275, 51 S. W. 789, 59 S. W. 524, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 625; Petit v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 262, 57 S. W. 14.

If the defendant is guilty, he had the right to have the jury fix both the minimum and the maximum punishment, and the instruction which compelled them to fix the maximum term of his punishment is in violation of § 465 of the Kentucky Statutes, and is a highly prejudicial error.

Waters v. Com. 171 Ky. 457, 188 S. W. 490.

Messrs. M. M. Logan, Attorney General, and D. O. Myatt, Assistant Attorney General, for the Commonwealth:

The law in force at the time of the commission of the offense determines the rights of the accused, and the court should instruct the jury under such law.

Albritten v. Com. 172 Ky. 274, 189 S. W. 204.

The rule that permits one to testify falsely in his own behalf and thus procure his acquittal, and then exempts him from prosecution for false swearing, is not only against good reason, but against sound public policy, and against the great weight of authority.

Martin v. Com. 154 Ky. 704, 159 S. W. 542; Allen v. United States, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 385, 114 C. C. A. 357, 194 Fed. 664; People v. Scully, 3 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 244; State v. Williams, 60 Kan. 838, 58 Pac. 476; State v. Beville, 79 Kan. 524, 131 Am. St. Rep. 345, 100 Pac. 476, 17 Ann. Cas. 753; State v. Cary, 159 Ind. 504, 65 N. E. 527; State v. Caywood, 96 Iowa, 372, 65 N. W. 385; State v. Vandemark, 77 Conn. 201, 58 Atl. 715, 1 Ann. Cas. 161; Dickerson v. State, 18 Wyo. 440, 111 Pac. 857, 116 Pac. 448; People v. St. Rep. 995, 68 Atl. 49, 13 Ann. Cas. 387; Wadlington v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1108, 60 S. W. 8.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Lincoln Teague, the appellant, was tried in the police court of Madisonville on the charge of selling beer in violation of the L.R.A.1917B.

Local Option Law, about 8 o'clock at night on October 16th, and found not guilty. On the trial of this prosecution, after being first duly sworn as a witness, Teague, testifying in his own behalf, said that he was not in Madisonville between the hours of 4 o'clock in the afternoon and 11:30 o'clock on the night of that day, and that he did not sell at his place of business in Madisonville the beer he was being prosecuted for selling. Thereafter the grand jury of Hopkins county returned an indictment against Teague, setting out in proper manner and form that on his trial he did "wilfully, knowingly, corruptly, and feloniously swear, depose, and give in evidence that on the day in question, viz., the 16th day of October, 1915, he (Teague) left the city of Madisonville, Hopkins county, Kentucky, about 4 o'clock P. M., and went to the city of Earlington, Hopkins county, Kentucky, and did not return to said city of Madisonville, Hopkins county, Kentucky, until about 11:30 o'clock P. M., when he came from said city of Earlington to said city of Madisonville on the passenger train No. 54, which arrives in said city of Madisonville about 11:30 o'clock P. M., which said statement was wilfully, knowingly, corruptly, and feloniously false and untrue, and the said Teague well knew it was false and untrue when he wilfully, corruptly, knowingly, feloniously, and falsely swore to it, for, in truth and in fact, said Teague did not leave the city of Madisonville, Hopkins county, Kentucky, about 4 o'clock P. M., and go to the city of Earlington, Hopkins county, Kentucky, and remain there and not return to the city of Madisonville until 11:30 o'clock P. M., and then did not come from said city of Earlington to the said city of Madisonville on the passenger train No. 54, which arrives in said city of Madisonville about 11:30 P. M., and the said Teague well knew said statements so sworn to by him as aforesaid were false and untrue."

But it did not charge, and could not truthfully have charged, that Teague was convicted. A general demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and thereafter, on May 3, 1916, Teague was put upon his trial and found guilty. The jury assessed his punishment at confinement for two years in the penitentiary, and from the judgment on his verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

On the trial under the indictment the evidence for the commonwealth was to the effect that at the trial of Teague in the police court he testified, after being sworn as a witness, that he was not in Madisonville between the hours of 4 o'clock in the afternoon and 11:30 on the night of October 16th, and that he did not, about 8 o'clock on the night of that day, sell the beer he was being prosecuted for selling, and further testified that on the afternoon of that day he left Madisonville about 4 o'clock and went to the city of Earlington, and did not return to Madisonville until 11:30 o'clock that night. There was also evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury that this testimony of Teague was false, and that, in fact, he was in Madisonville at his place of business about 8 o'clock on that night, and did sell beer in violation of the Local Option Law. On this appeal it is insisted that the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained, or, if not, that the motion made by counsel for Teague for a peremptory instruction should have been sustained. It is further urged that the court committed prejudicial error in limiting the time for argument allowed his counsel and in instructing the jury.

The argument in support of the proposition that the indictment was fatally defective is rested on the ground that it was indispensable to a good indictment that it should charge that Teague was convicted on the prosecution in the police court; and the argument in support of the contention that the jury should have been instructed to return a verdict of not guilty is based on the proposition that a conviction could not be sustained, as the uncontradicted evidence showed that Teague was acquitted on his trial in the police court.

These two points relied on for reversal involve the same question, and will be treated together. If it is necessary to sustain a prosecution for false swearing that the defendant should have been convicted at the trial during which the alleged false evidence was given, the indictment was fatally defective, and so, if it was indispensable to a conviction that the evidence should show that the accused was convicted, the motion for a directed verdict in his behalf should have been sustained. On the other hand, if a person may be indicted and convicted of the offense of giving false testimony in a prosecution against him, although he may have been acquitted by the jury of the offense charged, the indictment was good, and the evidence sufficient to sustain the conviction.

In Cooper v. Com. 106 Ky. 909, 45 L.R.A. 216, 90 Am. St. Rep. 275, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 625, 51 S. W. 789, it appears from the opinion that Cooper was indicted in the Rowan circuit court for the offense of adultery committed with one Libbie Purvis, and on the trial under that indictment he was acquitted; that thereafter the grand jury of Rowan county returned an indictment against Cooper, charging that upon his trial for adultery he testified that he had not had carnal, sexual intercourse with Libbie Purvis, which testimony was, as he knew, L.R.A.1917B.

false, and under this indictment he was convicted. In holding that the conviction for giving false testimony could not be sustained because Cooper had been acquitted of the offense with which he was charged on the trial in which the alleged false testimony was given, the court said in the course of the opinion: "Appellant in this case had already been tried and acquitted of the offense of having had carnal, sexual intercourse with Libbie Purvis, and the judgment in that case is res judicata against the commonwealth, and he cannot again be put on trial where the truth or falsity of the charge in that indictment is the gist of the question under investigation. It therefore follows that appellant was entitled to a peremptory instruction to the jury to find him not guilty."

Again, in Petit v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 262, 57 S. W. 14, it appears that Petit, on the trial of a prosecution against him for the offense of carrying concealed, on or about his person, a deadly weapon, testified in his own behalf that he did not have the pistol at the time and place charged in the indictment, and was acquitted by the verdict of the jury. Thereafter he was indicted for giving false evidence in the case in which he was acquitted, and on this indictment he was found guilty. In holding that the indictment for false swearing could not be maintained, the court said: "The question here presented is identical with the case of Cooper v. Com. supra, and it is admitted by the attorney general that, unless the Cooper Case be overruled, a reversal should be had. To that opinion we adhere."

It will thus be seen that if the ruling in the Cooper Case and the Petit Case is adhered to, the indictment against Teague was not good, and the motion for a directed verdict in his behalf should have been sustained, and accordingly the judgment appealed from should be reversed on these grounds. On this appeal we have carefully examined the reasoning upon which the decision in the Cooper Case was rested, and have reached the conclusion that that case, as well as the Petit Case which merely followed it, should be overruled. An investigation of this question discloses that, with the exception of the Cooper and Petit Cases, and the case of United States v. Butler (D. C.) 38 Fed. 498, in which a like ruling was made, the authorities are uniform that the acquittal in a prosecution against a defendant will not bar a subsequent prosecution against him for giving false testimony in the case in which he was acquitted.

The circuit court of appeals of the United States for the fourth circuit had before it in Allen v. United States, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 385, 114 C. C. A. 357, 194 Fed. 664, this identical question, and that court, after a review of the authorities, refused to follow the Federal case of United States v. Butler, or the two cases from this court, and held that, although the defendant had been acquitted at the trial at which the alleged false testimony was given, this did not bar a prosecution for giving false evidence on that trial. To the same effect are State v. Vandemark, 77 Conn. 201, 58 Atl. 715, 1 Ann. Cas. 161; Hutcherson v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 67, 24 S. W. 908; State v. Beville, 79 Kan. 524, 131 Am. St. Rep. 345, 100 Pac. 476, 17 Ann. Cas. 753; State v. Cary, 150 Ind. 504, 65 N. E. 527; State v. Caywood, 96 Iowa, 372, 65 N. W. 385; People v. Albers, 137 Mich. 679, 100 N. W. 908; State v. Smith, 119 Minn. 107, 137 N. W. 295; State v. Sargood, 80 Vt. 415, 130 Am. St. Rep. 995, 68 Atl. 49, 13 Ann. Cas. 367.

But aside from the great weight of authority opposed to the ruling in the Cooper, Petit, and Butler Cases, it seems to us that the reasoning on which these cases were rested is unsound, as well as unsafe. The efficient, as well as the correct, administration of the criminal law, demands that the defendant in a prosecution for false swearing of perjury should not be allowed to plead in bar of the prosecution the judgment of acquittal in the case in which the alleged false testimony was given. It will be observed that the decision in the Cooper Case, as well as the Butler Case, was put upon the ground that the judgment of acquittal in the prosecution was an adjudication that the defendant was not guilty of the offense charged, and hence it followed that he could not, in a subsequent prosecution, be punished for giving the evidence upon which his acquittal was secured. In other words, the judgment of acquittal was held to be res judicata. If this were so, it would seem to logically follow that a judgment of conviction in the prosecution in which the alleged false evidence was given would likewise be conclusive evidence of the guilt of the accused in a prosecution for false swearing in testifying that he was not guilty of the offense for which he was found guilty. But in neither the Cooper nor the Butler Cases was the court willing to carry the principle announced to its logical conclusion and give a judgment of conviction the same effect as a judgment of acquittal would have. And this itself sufficiently demonstrates the unsoundness of the view taken in these cases. The effect of the ruling in the Cooper and Butler Cases is that the defendant, in a prosecution against him, may practise a fraud upon the court and the jury, and secure his acquittal by means of this fraud perpetrated by and through the medium of his false evidence, and yet this fraud will be sanctioned to such an extent as to make the judgment of acquittal conclusive evidence of his innocence in swearing that he was not guilty of the offense charged, although in truth and in fact he might have been proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and convicted, if all the facts in the case had been truthfully put before the court and jury. The rule announced in the Cooper and Butler Cases would, in effect, make a judgment of acquittal in a criminal case obtained by fraud conclusive, and beyond the power of the court to reinvestigate. But the rule everywhere prevails that a judgment obtained by fraud is not conclusive, and the means by which it was secured may be reinvestigated and a different result reached even in a collateral attack on the fraudulent judgment, when the wrong cannot be corrected by appeal; and in a criminal case, a judgment of acquittal, although obtained by fraud, cannot be reopened on an appeal. When the defendant is put upon his trial and acquitted, that is an end of the matter, and so if the defendant, in a prosecution against him, could, by giving false testimony, secure a judgment of acquittal when, if the truth had been known, there would have been a judgment of conviction, it would necessarily follow that the defendant could commit two crimes against the commonwealth, one the offense with which he was charged in the prosecution in which he gave false evidence, and the other the crime of false swearing, and go free of punishment for each.

It needs no citation of authority or elaborate argument to show that no rule of court-made law or practice that would permit conditions like this to prevail should be tolerated in a jurisdiction where punishment is supposed to follow the wilful violation of a statute. But we are not without authority on this subject, because a like question was presented in Carrington v. Com. 78 Ky. 83. In that case, as appears from the opinion, Carrington, under what are now §§ 1073 and 1076 of the Kentucky Statutes, under an indictment found against him in the circuit court, was tried in the county court, and when it was afterwards sought to try him in the circuit court, he attempted to plead in bar the judgment of the county court. But the circuit court rejected this plea upon the ground that the proceedings in the county court were fraudulent, and in sustaining the circuit court this court said: "The circuit court properly refused to permit its jurisdiction to be ousted, and to allow the prisoner, by a device so transparent, to choose the tribunal in which he would be tried. A judgment of acquittal thus procured was not a bar, and was properly disregarded. It is to be treated as if the prisoner had procured himself to be accused, arrested, and tried, and then attempted to plead the judgment thus obtained in bar; for, although he had been regularly indicted, he procured a trial in the quarterly court by a fraud upon the statute giving that court jurisdiction."

To the same effect are Reddy v. Com. 97 Ky. 784, 31 S. W. 730, and McDermott v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1227, 100 S. W. 830.

In Freeman on Judgments, § 318, it is also said: "The principles applicable to judgments in criminal cases are, in general, identical, so far as the question of estoppel is involved, with the principles recognized in civil cases. An acquittal or a conviction under an indictment for any offense is a bar to any subsequent indictment substantially like the former. But in criminal, as in civil actions, it is essential that the judgment be on the merits, and not tainted with fraud. Thus going into a favorable court, and submitting to a conviction, in order to escape a severe penalty, is no bar to a bona fide prosecution."

It is fundamental in the policy of the law that judicial proceedings and judgment shall be fair and free from fraud, and litigants and parties be encouraged, when sworn as witnesses, to tell the truth, and punished if they do not. If, however, a party accused of crime could secure immunity from prosecution for false swearing or perjury by securing his acquittal through these means, the law would be offering a reward for false swearing by affording the person guilty of its protection instead of inflicting punishment. Many persons accused of committing offenses against the law, and especially persons of low character, who are most commonly the offenders, would feel entirely free to give false evidence in their own behalf, and take the chance of thereby securing an acquittal, if they knew that an acquittal would bar a prosecution against them for giving the false evidence, and that if they were convicted the conviction would not be conclusive evidence that they were guilty of false swearing. The reason and the common sense of the thing are opposed to a rule that would make it possible for a guilty party to escape punishment when he had secured his acquittal of the offense charged by false testimony.

It may be suggested that if a person who told the truth in a prosecution against him was acquitted, a sufficient number of his enemies might be able to procure his indictment and conviction by giving evidence that his testimony was, in fact, false, and therefore the innocent defendant might be convicted of false swearing. It is, of course, L.R.A.1917B.

possible that a situation like this might arise, but it is not probable, and the possibility of wrong is too remote to have any controlling influence on the principle at stake.

It further appears that on the trial of this case the lower court limited the argument of counsel for the defendant to thirty minutes, and it is pressed on our attention that, although the judgment of conviction may be reversed for other reasons, we should, for the guidance of the trial judge on another trial, if there be one, indicate that a longer time should be allowed for the argument of the case than was permitted on this trial.

It is at once apparent that the time that should be allowed for the argument of cases cannot be regulated by a rule fixing the time that should be allowed in any particular case, because every case presents different facts and circumstances, and so, although we have in some cases held that the time allowed for argument was not sufficient, and in other cases held that it was, we have adopted the practice of leaving it to the trial judge to regulate, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the time for argument in each case, and it is only when it plainly appears that this discretion has been abused to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant that his refusal to allow a longer time will be deemed reversible error. Thus it was said in Combs v. Com. 97 Ky. 24, 29 S. W. 734: "What length of time the ends of justice and rights of an accused party require should be allowed for argument to the jury on a criminal trial must, from necessity, be generally left to the sound discretion of the trial court; otherwise an undue portion of the time of a court might be needlessly consumed in the trial of one cause, to detriment of other business and rights of other parties."

In somewhat different form in Stout v. Com. 148 Ky. 199, 146 S. W. 407, the same idea was expressed as follows: "We have ruled in a number of cases that the time that shall be allowed for argument is a matter in the discretion of the trial judge, and that unless it affirmatively appears that this discretion has been abused to the prejudice of the accused, it will not amount to reversible error. Combs v. Com. supra; Harris v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 297, 74 S. W. 1044; Scott v. Com. 148 Ky. 80, 146 S. W. 406. The trial court should, of course, allow counsel for the accused in every case reasonable time and opportunity to present the reasons why there should be an acquittal, but it is obvious that the time that should be allowed depends upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case. It is not to be altogether regulated by the number of witnesses that are introduced, as a very complicated state of facts might be presented by the testimony of a single witness. It is rather to be controlled by the simplicity of the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction."

We may, however, say that, taking into consideration the gravity of the offense, the number of witnesses who testified in the case in behalf of the commonwealth and the defendant, one hour would not be more than reasonable time to allow for the argument of the case.

The crime charged in the indictment was committed in October, 1915, at a time when what is known as the "Indeterminate Sentence Law," found in § 1136 of the Kentucky Statutes, was in effect. Under that statute the jury had the right, if they found the defendant guilty, to fix an indeterminate sentence not less than the minimum time nor greater than the maximum time of imprisonment prescribed by law for the punishment of the offender, so that, under the statute which prescribes that the punishment for false swearing shall be confinement for not less than one nor more than five years, the jury might have returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty and fixing his punishment at not less than one nor more than five years' confinement in the state penitentiary. Before the trial was had, however, the Indeterminate Sentence Law was repealed by an act of 1916 that may be found in the Acts of 1916, p. 430, and the trial court, being of the opinion that the provisions of the 1916 act should control, instructed the jury that, if they believed the defendant was guilty, they should fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years; and the jury found the defendant guilty, and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for two years.

It was held in Albritten v. Com. 172 Ky. 274, 189 S. W. 204, a case presenting this precise question, that a defendant must be punished under the law in force at the time the offense was committed, and not under the law in force at the time of the trial. This general statement, however, is to be considered as controlled by § 465 of the Kentucky Statutes. Therefore the court in this case should have instructed the jury under the Indeterminate Sentence Law.

For the error in the instructions, the judgment must be reversed.

Annotation—Acquittal of crime as bar to a subsequent prosecution of defendant for perjury committed on the former trial.

Earlier cases considering the question under annotation will be found in the note to Allen v. United States, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 385.

TEAGUE v. COM. ante, 738, it will be observed expressly overrules Cooper v. Com. and Petit v. Com., cited in the earlier note, and puts itself in line with the great weight of authority in holding that, although one has been acquitted at the trial at which false testimony was given, the acquittal does not bar the prosecution of such person for giving false evidence on that trial.

Since the earlier note it has been held in McDaniel v. State (1915) 13 Ala. App. 318, 69 So. 351, writ of certiorari denied in (1915) 193 Ala. 678, 69 So. 1018, that one, although acquitted of the charge of burglary, may be convicted of the crime of perjury in having falsely testified at the trial of the burglary charge, that at the time of his arrest he was unarmed. Certainly, the court said, it cannot be said that the jury in the burglary case, by acquitting defendant of the charge of burglary, adjudicated not only the truth of his statement that he was not guilty, but also the truth of his statement that at the time of his arrest he did not have a pistol, and did not place his hand upon the pistol, etc.,—falsity in making which statement is the charge here made against defendant, and not falsity in making the former statement; that is, the statement of his innocence of crime.

So, also, in Miles v. State (1914) 73 Tex. Crim. Rep. 493, 165 S. W. 567, it was held that one acquitted of the charge of assault with intent to murder may be tried and convicted for perjury in having falsely sworn on that trial that he did not shoot the person alleged to have been shot. As to the contention that there was a second trial for the same offense, the court said: "The assault to murder was committed on June 13, 1912. The perjury was committed by appellant in a trial had in the district court on September 17, 1912. The Constitution and statute are that no man shall be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense. By no stretch of the imagination can an assault with intent to murder committed on June 13, 1912, be held to be the same offense, or anything akin to it, as perjury committed on September 17, 1912, even though the perjury is committed on the trial of the assault to murder case. Such a doctrine contended for by appellant could not for one moment be sanctioned by this court as correct. Here it is established without doubt and without question that appellant in the dead hours of the night with his gun, a deadly weapon, crept up to within shooting distance of his intended victim, who was lying upon her bed in her own house, and attempted to assassinate her by shooting her through the body; and soon thereafter stated to four or five separate and distinct witnesses that he had shot and intended to kill her, and he fled and attempted to make his escape. Afterwards he was caught by the officers, duly indicted and tried, and by his perjured testimony secured an acquittal of his dastardly assault to murder and intention to assassinate his victim. Then, to hold that, because he escaped merited punishment for his first crime, he should go scot-free from his crime of perjury, would be monstrous indeed. We deem it unnecessary to further discuss the two offenses to demonstrate that they are not the same, and by no stretch of the imagination could be construed to be the same."

Again, in Murff v. State (1914) 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 5, 172 S. W. 238, one acquitted of the charge of rape was held to have been properly tried and convicted of perjury for having falsely sworn at the trial of the rape charge that he had not had or attempted to have sexual intercourse with prosecutrix in that trial. If appellant's contention is correct, the court said, then, when an accused is tried for any offense, and he commits perjury on such trial, the mere trial itself would be perfect immunity for any perjury that might be committed on the trial thereof. This the court considered would be offering a high premium to everyone who is charged with crime to testify falsely on his trial so as to secure an acquittal, for, if such contention could be correct, such person could commit perjury and could not be tried for any perjury he might commit on such trial, and accused, the court added, has no more right to commit perjury on any trial where he is tried for an offense and testifies falsely, and then go scot-free, than any other witness.

So, also, in Hutcherson v. State (1894) 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 67, 24 S. W. 908, it was held that there was no error in refusing to admit as evidence in a trial for perjury a judgment of acquittal in the trial at which the perjury was alleged to have been committed.

JOHN D. HINES

v.

NEW ENGLAND CASUALTY COMPANY,
Appt.

(— N. C. —, 90 S. E. 131.)

Insurance — health — hernia — breach of representation.

1. The existence of hernia does not per se avoid a policy of health insurance because of a breach of representation that insured is in sound condition, but the question whether or not it is sufficient to render the applicant unsound is for the jury; at least where the statute provides that no representations shall prevent a recovery unless materially affecting the risk.

For other cases, see Insurance, III. c, 2, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — confinement to house — walking as part of treatment.

2. One is not shown not to have been confined to his house or a hospital within the meaning of a health insurance policy, by the fact that, acting under the directions of his physician, he visited the office of the latter and walked or rode out as part of the treatment prescribed by the physician.

For other cases, see Insurance, VI. c, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(October 11, 1916.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Franklin County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a health insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Ruffin, for appellant:

The suppression of the fact of plaintiff's disease avoided the policy.

Messrs. W. H. Yarborough, Jr., and Ben T. Holden for appellee.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover on a health insurance policy which contained promised indemnity for partial disability, confinement to the house accompanied by disability, and confinement in a hospital accompanied by disability. Each of these was at different rates and the claims made under the three classes of indemnity aggregated $382.14. The defense was that the insured had a disease at the time of application which he did not disclose, and that the defendant was not liable under the indemnity either L.R.A.1917B.

for confinement at the house or confinement in the hospital, for that it was not such as entitled the plaintiff to indemnity therefor, but only to partial indemnity.

The exceptions, seventeen in number, may be grouped under two heads,—those which relate to the refusal of the motion to nonsuit, and those which relate to the construction of the words, “within a house” and “within a hospital.” As to the first exception, the plaintiff had, as it appears, at the time of the application, a slight attack of hernia. He was not asked if he had that disease. If so, his answer in the negative would have vitiated the contract; because the defendant company had a right to make any disease material, and if the plaintiff had answered untruly, this would have been a misrepresentation. The statement in the application on which the defendant relies is the following: “I have never had fits or disorders of the brain. My habits of life are correct and temperate, and I am in sound condition, mentally and physically, except as follows: No exceptions.”

Few people are absolutely exempt from some variation from a perfect condition, and, unless such variation is specifically asked about in the application and denied, it is not matter vitiating the policy, unless the variation was serious enough to affect his “soundness” so that anyone would say who knew the facts, “He is not a sound man.”

The plaintiff testified that he had hernia, but that he did not suffer from it at all. Dr. Perry testified as an expert that he had examined the plaintiff two years later, in August, 1914; that he then made a physical examination of the plaintiff for life insurance; that he examined the indications of hernia, and recommended the plaintiff for insurance in another company as a sound man. He further testified: “I was of the opinion that he was a sound man. . . . I would not think that the hernia would affect Mr. Hines's health to any degree.”

Hernia sometimes is a most serious defect, making the sufferer an unsound man. In other cases it is simply a slight imperfection which would not render him unsound in any respect, according to the testimony in this case. Therefore the court properly submitted to the jury the issue whether the plaintiff's answer, as above set out, was false or not, or whether at the time he made the application he was in the ordinary acceptance of the words “a sound man.” It is not every ailment or indisposition or imperfection that makes one an unsound man. There must be such a condition that there is a material departure from a sound condition. The issue was left fully and fairly to the jury as an issue of fact, and they found with the plaintiff.

The defendant has not contended that the plaintiff's representations were fraudulently made, but insists that the insured should not be the judge of the materiality of such representations; but neither could the defendant be sole judge. The question is not whether the plaintiff had hernia, for this is not denied, but whether it was of such nature as to have rendered him an unsound man at the time of the application. The jury is the only tribunal which can settle the disputed facts, for this is an issue of fact, and not a matter of law. The illness from which the plaintiff suffered subsequently and for which he seeks to recover is an attack of rheumatism which had no connection with, nor was there any evidence to show that it was in any way traceable to, hernia.

Revisal, § 4808, provides that all statements in an application for insurance shall be held merely representations, and not warranties, and that no representations, unless fraudulent or materially affecting a risk, shall prevent a recovery. This matter was properly submitted to the jury, and they found that "the plaintiff was of sound physical condition at the time he signed the application, notwithstanding such hernia, and that his representations at the time he applied for the policy were not false, and were not material to the defendant in determining whether it would issue the policy."

The court instructed the jury that whether he was in sound health or not was a matter for the jury to determine upon the evidence, depending upon whether the extent of the hernia he had was such as to render him unsound or not.

The second proposition involved is whether the plaintiff has brought his case, upon the evidence, within the conditions which entitle him to recover because "confined within a house or within a hospital." The court instructed the jury that the words, "confined in his home," do not mean that he must be actually confined within the four walls of his house, but it means that he was entitled to indemnity while kept in his home on account of sickness and unable to leave for any purpose not connected with his sickness. If, during such illness, he was able to visit friends or his place of business, he would not have been "confined." But if, acting under the directions of the physician, he called at his doctor's office, or the mere fact that he walked out under his directions as a part of the treatment the physician was giving him, this would L.R.A.1917B.

not require the jury to find that he was not confined to his home.

The court also instructed the jury that, within the meaning of this policy, a man would be "confined within a hospital" during such time as he was therein and subject to its rules and regulations, although at times walking or driving in the grounds of the hospital, or even outside the grounds, provided such walking or driving was taken under the rules and regulations of the hospital physician as a part of the treatment; but if during that time the plaintiff was able to leave the hospital, or left it for social purposes, or for business reasons, then he would not have been "confined" within the meaning of the policy.

The court instructed the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to satisfy them by the greater weight of the evidence that, notwithstanding the hernia, he was not suffering therefrom at the time of the application for the policy, and was, in fact, a sound man at that time, and also that the burden was upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that he was confined in his home and in the hospital in the manner already charged, and the burden was upon him to show the length of time; that the burden was upon the defendant to satisfy the jury that from the nature of the hernia it would have prevented it from issuing the policy, if it had been informed thereof.

The charge is very full, and the jury must have understood the matters of fact left to them. We find no error of law committed during the trial.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I am of opinion that the motion to nonsuit should have been sustained, because upon the plaintiff's own testimony he is not entitled to recover. The admitted facts are that the plaintiff filed a written application with the defendant for a Plymouth Rock health policy, and in that application he represented that he had not been exposed to any contagious or infectious disease, and that at the time of the application nor for a year past had he had any local or other disease, except as follows: "No exceptions."

It is admitted at the time that the plaintiff filed this application and made this representation that he suffered from a disease or infirmity called "inguinal hernia." It is a matter of common knowledge that hernia is an infirmity and a disease of which the sufferer is bound to have personal knowledge. When he made out the application for the policy of insurance, in answer to the question, he said he had no disease and no infirmity, and the space where he was expected to write the exception was filled in, "No exceptions." The defendant company had a right to assume from this application that the plaintiff was in every respect sound.

It is proven by the testimony of plaintiff's own experts, as well as the defendant's, that hernia can only be cured by an operation, and that its tendency is to grow worse and impair the health. Medical books declare that hernia consists of a protrusion, generally of the bowels, which has escaped from its natural cavity, and projects through some natural or accidental opening in the walls of the latter, as hernia of the brain, of the bowels, or of the lungs. Hernia of the abdominal viscera is a common disease or infirmity, and is commonly called "rupture." The disease of which the plaintiff suffered is called "inguinal hernia," because it is in the region of the inguen or groin.

I am of opinion that his Honor should have instructed the jury that the disease from which the plaintiff suffered or the infirmity, whichever it is called, was such as would prevent a recovery in this action, for it is manifestly a physical unsoundness. It was error to leave the effect of the disease to the jury to determine. It was substantially permitting the jury to act as medical experts and determine whether the defendant should have made such contract. The effect of the hernia, in determining the nature of the risk assumed, as well as fixing the rate of the insurance, was a matter solely for the judgment of the insurer before it entered into the contract at all. It had the right to have the facts truthfully disclosed, so that its officials could determine whether the risk was one proper to be taken. It was obviously the intent of the defendant in making inquiries to learn the nature and character of any and all diseases and unsoundness that might exist, so as to decide for itself whether the plaintiff was a proper subject for insurance. It is not necessary for the plaintiff to have acted fraudulently; it is only necessary to show that he acted erroneously and stated the fact untruly.

While § 4808 of the Revisal of 1905 of North Carolina declares that all statements in an application for insurance are mere representations, and not warranties, and that no representation, unless material or fraudulent, shall prevent a recovery, yet a material misrepresentation will avoid a policy if it is calculated to influence the insurer in making the contract. Gardner v. North State Mut. L. Ins. Co. 163 N. C. 367, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 714, 79 S. E. 806, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 652; Fishblate v. Fidelity & C. Co. 140 N. C. 589, 53 S. E. 354.

Every fact which is untruly stated or wrongfully suppressed in an application for insurance must be regarded as material, if it would influence the insurer into making or refusing to make the contract. A false representation avoids the policy when material wholly without reference to its intent, unless otherwise provided by statute. And we have no statute to the contrary. Fishblate v. Fidelity & C. Co. supra. If the company was imposed upon (whether fraudulently or not is immaterial) by such representations, and induced to enter into the contract, assuming that both parties acted in the utmost good faith, justice would require that the contract be canceled and the premiums returned. Alexander v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 150 N. C. 536, 64 S. E. 432.

Under all the authorities, the suppression of the true facts, whether fraudulently or not, avoids the policy. Bryant v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983; Schas v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 166 N. C. 55, 81 S. E. 1014; Vance, Ins. pp. 267-269.

We find a case very similar to this in 11 App. Div. 245, 42 N. Y. Supp. 228, Hanna v. Mutual Life Asso. quoted in Kerr on Insurance, p. 341, in which a warranty against local injury or infirmity is held to be broken if the insured at the time was suffering from a stricture. While hernia is not a serious illness, it is nevertheless a physical infirmity, an unsoundness, and the failure to make it known in the application voids the policy.

Walker, J., concurs in this opinion.

Annotation—Insurance: hernia as breach of condition or warranty as to health or bodily condition.

As to innocent misrepresentation as to health of insured when he has an undiscovered disease see annotation to Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. v. Jeffords, 53 L.R.A. 193 and Supreme Lodge K. L. H. v. Payne, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1277.

In should be noted that the court in HINES v. NEW ENGLAND CASUALTY CO. L.R.A.1917B.

ante, 744, decided that the existence of a hernia did not per se avoid the health policy involved on the ground that it constituted a breach of the representation that the insured was in "sound condition," but held that the question whether he was rendered unsound because of the hernia was for the jury where it was provided by statute that no representation should prevent a recovery unless it materially affected the risk.

With respect to warranties of good or sound health by applicants for insurance in 14 R. C. L. 1068, the rule is laid down as follows, "A warranty that the insured is in good or sound health is not broken unless the insured has an ailment of a character so well defined as appreciably to affect his health. Only an ordinary and reasonable degree of health is required and this question is generally to be determined by the jury."

The decision in Collins v. Casualty Co. of America (1916) — Mass. —, L.R.A.1916E, 1203, 112 N. E. 634, is in accord with the conclusion in HINES v. NEW ENGLAND CASUALTY CO. In the Collins Case where an applicant for accident insurance warranted that he was in sound condition physically when in fact he was predisposed to rupture, and a statute provided that no warranty should be deemed material or defeat or avoid a policy unless the warranty was made with actual intent to deceive or unless the matter made a warranty increased the risk of loss, it was held, there being no evidence that the warranty was made with the intent to deceive, that the only question was whether it was one which increased the risk of loss, and this was held a question for the jury, the burden of proving it being upon the insurer.

There was evidence, not objected to, in this case not only that a predisposition to rupture increased the risk of loss but that accident insurance companies generally did not take a risk in such a case, but it was held that the jury were not bound to believe this testimony, and a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained.

In Levie v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 117, 39 N. E. 792, there was evidence that the insured had suffered from a strangulated hernia which had been reduced only after the calling of two physicians and the application of either, and the court said that it assumed that this experience was an illness which truth required the insured to disclose instead of giving a negative answer to a question in an application for life insurance for full particulars of any illness since childhood, and the names of medical attendants, and that his negative answer was a misrepresentation which would have avoided the policy if it had not been for a statute which provided that no misrepresentation by an insured should defeat a policy unless it was made with actual intent to deceive, or unless L.R.A.1917B.

the matter misrepresented increased the risk of loss; but in view of these provisions the questions whether the insured's misrepresentation was made with intent to deceive, or the matter misrepresented increased the risk of loss were held upon the evidence for the jury, and a finding for the plaintiff was sustained.

It was further held in this case that a question in the application whether the applicant was ruptured and if so whether he wore a well fitting truss related to the time of the answer.

The court in this case stated that conceding that upon the evidence the only reasonable finding was that the applicant had suffered from a strangulated hernia the year before his application, yet there was evidence tending to show that he had recovered from it before the time of his application, that it was not a matter of law that one who has once had hernia is thence forward "ruptured," and that whether the insured's negative answer to the question whether he was ruptured was correct was for the jury.

In Keen v. Continental Casualty Co. (1915) — Iowa, —, 154 N. W. 409, where the insured stated in his application for accident insurance that he was not then suffering from hernia the lower court instructed the jury that if they found that the insured had hernia at the time of his application they should return a verdict for the defendant. The jury found that the insured was not so afflicted and this finding and also the finding that he was not afflicted with hernia at the time he suffered a hernia through an accident, and that his death was due solely to the accident, were held to be supported by the evidence.

In Hilts v. United States Casualty Co. (1913) 176 Mo. App. 635, 159 S. W. 771, which was an action on a policy providing for an indemnity, among other things, in case of a surgical operation for hernia, it was held that there was no breach of a warranty by the plaintiff that he was free from any "functional or organic disease, mental or physical disorder, defect" etc., although at the time it was made he might have had a predisposition to hernia, or by reason of exertion the inguinal ring had been weakened, causing hernia to subsequently develop.

The trial court in this case instructed the jury that there might have been premonitory symptoms of, or a predisposition to hernia in plaintiff which had not arrived at a state of being the disease itself, "and that mere premonitory symptoms of or a predisposition to hernia in plaintiff should not be regarded as the existence of the disease itself." This instruction was attacked on the ground that a "symptom" of a disease is not a forerunner thereof or a warning of a disease likely to develop in the future but an evidence of a present existing trouble. It was held that it was intended by this instruction to tell the jury that there might have been a predisposition to hernia or such condition existing as would likely result in the development of a hernia, though the latter was not then in existence, and that this was supported by the medical testimony, and that the giving of the instruction was not reversible error.

In Life Asso. of Scotland v. Foster (1873) 11 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 351, 45 Scot. Jur. 240, 4 Bigelow, Life & Acci. Ins. Rep. 520, the applicant believed herself to be in perfect health and stated that she was in good health and not afflicted with any diseases, external or internal, and that her statements were true, and that she had not withheld or concealed any important circumstances, and agreed that such declaration should be the basis of the contract, and that if any untrue averment was made therein the policy should be void, and also stated in the medical examination that she never had had rupture and that in her own opinion she was in perfect health, and declared that her statements "were faithful and true." She had at the time a swelling on her groin which to a medical man might have indicated a rupture, but it gave her no pain or uneasiness, and she attached no importance to it but after the application, because of unusual exertion, it suddenly increased in size and ultimately proved fatal. The court in this case held that while an insurance contract might be so drawn as to make freedom from specified diseases, however latent, a matter of warranty it was not so in this case, and that if the insured did not know that the rupture existed, and made her answer in good faith, its existence would not prevent a recovery.

And where an applicant for life insurance answers a question in the application as to whether he had ever had certain diseases, including a rupture, in the negative, but qualifies his answer by stating "the above is as near correct as I remember" the right to recover on the policy will not be defeated although the insured had had a rupture, unless he knew or had reason to believe that his answer was untrue. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. France (1877) 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. ed. 287, affirming (1873) Fed. Cas. No. 5,027.

Generally as to effect of qualifying statements on warrants by words of "best of my knowledge and belief" or words of like import see annotation to Smith v. Prudential Ins. Co. 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 431.

Where a life insurance policy provides that if the insured's answers to the questions in the application are untrue or fraudulent or there is any suppression of facts in regard to his health they shall render the policy void the materiality of the statements is removed from the consideration of the court or jury, and in an action in which it is claimed that the policy was avoided because the insured answered a question whether he had ever had a rupture falsely in the negative, the only question which should be submitted to the jury is whether the applicant at the time he made the answer had ever had a rupture, and it is error to also submit to the jury the question whether, if the insured ever had a rupture, it increased the risk and was material to the risk. *Ætna L. A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Rowan County sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed to recover damages for malicious prosecution or for wrongful abuse of process. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. H. Price and Edward C. Jerome, for appellant:

An action for malicious prosecution or for abuse of process can be maintained without an allegation of an arrest of the person or seizure of property.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for malicious prosecution, or the wrongful abuse of process, as he states L.R.A.1917B.

in his brief. Whatever may be the cause of action, whether the one or the other of those named, we think the court properly sustained the demurrer. The defendant brought suit on a note given by plaintiff, and merely caused a summons to be served on him as he was passing through the state of New Jersey on a train. There was no attachment levied, or other interference with the plaintiff's property, nor was there any process against his person. The issuing and service of the summons were all. The defendant had a legal right to sue in this state, New York, or New Jersey, and to serve a summons there on the plaintiff (in this action) wherever he could be found. The case is within the principle stated in Ely v. Davis, 111 N. C. 24, 15 S. E. 878; Terry v. Davis, 114 N. C. 31, 18 S. E. 943; Carpenter v. Hanes, 167 N. C. 551, 83 S. E. 577. The cases relied on in this court will be found to belong to that class where some other process than a summons has been issued against the property or person of the defendant in the action, as in Pittsburg, J. E. & E. R. Co. v. Wakefield Hardware Co. 138 N. C. 174, 50 S. E. 571, 3 Ann. Cas. 720; a. c. 143 N. C. 54, 55 S. E. 422; Jackson v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 139 N. C. 356, 70 L.R.A. 738, 51 S. E. 1015; Ludwick v. Penny, 158 N. C. 104, 73 S. E. 228; Wright v. Harris, 160 N. C. 542, 76 S. E. 489; Carpenter v. Hanes, supra. In all these cases there was something more done than the issuing and service of a summons. The case of Chatham Estates v. American Nat. Bank, 171 N. C. 579, 88 S. E. 783, upon which the plaintiff relied so much, does not sustain his position. The civil suit, alleged in that case to have been wrongful and which caused injury to the plaintiff, was one to impose a lien upon the defendant's property by a lis pendens, of practically the same force and effect as if there had been an attachment levied. There was something done in the former action which was directly injurious to the plaintiff apart from the issuing of the summons, and all that is said in the Chatham Estates Case must be considered with reference to that important fact. There is a very able and exhaustive discussion of the doctrine in Muldoon v. Rickey, 103 Pa. 110, 49 Am. Rep. 117, where the cases are fully discussed. See also Potts v. Imlay, 4 N. J. L. 330, 7 Am. Dec. 603; Wetmore v. Mellinger, 64 Iowa, 741, 52 Am. Rep. 465, 18 N. W. 870; McNamee v. Minke, 49 Md. 122; Johnson v. King, 64 Tex. 226; Turner v. Walker, 3 Gill & J. 377, 22 Am. Dec. 329; State, Bitz, Prosecutor, v. Meyer, 40 N. J. L. 252, 29 Am. Rep. 233; Mitchell v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 398. The rule is succinctly stated in Wetmore v. Mellinger, supra, as follows (64 Iowa, 744, 52 Am. Rep. 265, 18 N. W. 871): "We think the doctrine is well established by the great preponderance of authority that no action will lie for the institution and prosecution of a civil action with malice and without probable cause, where there has been no arrest of the person or seizure of the property of defendant, and no special injury sustained, which would not necessarily result in all suits prosecuted to recover for like causes of action,"—citing numerous cases.

And in Bitz v. Meyer, supra, the court said (40 N. J. L. 255, 20 Am. Rep. 233): "In Goslin v. Wilcock, 2 Wils. K. B. 302, 95 Eng. Reprint, 824, the defendant in the alleged malicious suit was arrested by process out of a court which had no jurisdiction, and on that ground the action for malicious prosecution was maintained; but my research has not found a case where the defendant was not arrested, and no special grievance was laid, in which it has been held that suit will lie, where costs were or could have been awarded to the defendant in the original action. Since the statute (4 James I, chap. 3), which gives costs to a defendant in all actions, in case of a nonsuit or verdict against the plaintiff, and other statutes giving costs in other stages of the case, the English courts have not considered the malicious institution of a civil suit a sufficient basis for an action at law, where no arrest or special grievance is alleged. Savil v. Roberts, 1 Salk, 14, 91 Eng. Reprint, 14; Purton v. Honnor, 1 Bos. & P. 205, 126 Eng. Reprint, 861. In such cases, the measure of punishment to be inflicted upon a plaintiff who is actuated by malice is the costs given by statute."

What is said by Chief Justice Kirkpatrick in Potts v. Imlay, approved in 4 N. J. L. 330, 7 Am. Dec. 603, supra, is applicable to this case: "In the case of Savil v. Roberts, in the time of William III., 1 Salk. 15, 91 Eng. Reprint, 14, which seems to be a leading case on this subject, Holt, Ch. J., says: 'A civil action differs very far from an indictment in this respect. In a civil action, the defendant has his costs and the plaintiff is amerced for his false claim. To bring a civil action therefore, though there be no ground, is not actionable, because it is a claim of right in the King's courts to which every subject may resort, and he has found pledges, is amercible for his false claim, and liable to costs. It is not enough to declare that such action was ex malitia et sine causa, per quod, he was put to great charges; he must go further; he must show special grievance, as that the prosecutor had no cause of action, or cause of action only to a small sum, and that he had sued out a latitat for a large sum with intent to imprison him, or do him some special prejudice.' So in Lord Chief Baron Gilbert's report of the case of Parker v. Langley, Gilb. L. & Eq. 161, 93 Eng. Reprint, 293, about the close of Queen Anne's reign, where this doctrine is investigated with much ability, Parker, Chief Justice, in giving the opinion of the court, says: 'The applying, in a civil action, to a court of justice for satisfaction or redress, has been so much favored that no action has ever been allowed against a plaintiff for such suit singly and directly on pretense of its being false and malicious. . . . ' I have had occasion to look into this doctrine once before, in the case of Woodmansie v. Logan, 2 N. J. L. 93. The opinion then expressed is precisely the same which I now entertain upon looking further into the question, aided, as I have been, by so careful an examination of books, and so able an argument at bar. Upon the whole, upon the strength of these authorities, I think it may be laid down as law that this action cannot be maintained for prosecuting a civil suit in a court of common law having competent jurisdiction by the party himself in interest, unless the defendant has, upon such prosecution been arrested without cause and deprived of his liberty, or made to suffer other special grievance different from, and superadded to, the ordinary expense of a defense. The case before us is for a suit commenced by summons, where there could be no arrest; nor does the state of demand set forth any grievance or damage, other than, or different from, the common expenses of making defense in suits of this kind. That the litigation was protracted as far as the rules of the court would admit; that it was renewed and ultimately discontinued by the party,—does not alter the case. These circumstances are, at most, only evidence that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause; but this is not enough. There must be special grievance, and that specifically charged in the complaint filed."

In Johnson v. King, 64 Tex. 226, the court held that "the institution of a civil action by one in his own right for the purpose of enforcing a claim, whether that claim be real or unfounded, affords no cause of action against the party suing, unless by the abuse of process the person or property of the defendant be seized or in some manner injuriously affected (following Smith v. Adams, 27 Tex. 31, and Haldeman v. Chambers, 19 Tex. 53). To create a cause of action, there must not only be a loss to the plaintiff, but a loss resulting from the violation of some legal right."

The facts in that case and those in Carpenter v. Hanes, 167 N. C. 551, 83 S. E.

577, are very similar. There are cases to the contrary, but some are distinguishable from this case, and the doctrine of others has not been adopted by us.

"Regular and legitimate use of process, though with a bad intention, is not malicious abuse of process." Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 356, *221.

When a right is being prosecuted in a lawful and proper way, the hidden motive behind it is not taken into account. If there is any loss to the defendant in the suit, it is damnum absque injuria. It is alleged in the complaint, and, as against a demurrer, it must be taken as admitted, that there was a suit on the note by the defendant Leslie M. Shaw in the Federal court at Greensboro, which resulted in a judgment against the defendant in that suit, plaintiff in this. This tends, of course, to repel any suggestion that the debt was not due or that defendant in this case intended to harass the plaintiff by suing for the recovery of a nonexistent debt, but whether so or not, there was nothing illegal in what this defendant did in New Jersey, and the demurrer, therefore, was properly sustained. Affirmed.

Annotation—Malicious prosecution: bringing civil action in remote district or foreign jurisdiction.

As to debtor's right of action against his creditor for collecting debt in another jurisdiction, in evasion of exemption laws of their domicil, see notes to Stewart v. Thomson, 36 L.R.A. 582, and Markely v. Murphy, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 689.

There is but little direct authority upon the question whether an action for malicious prosecution may rest upon the institution and prosecution of a civil suit in a remote district or foreign jurisdiction, apart from an attachment of property or arrest of the person, or other special damage.

As appears from JEROME v. SHAW, ante, 749; Carpenter v. Hanes (1914) 167 N. O. 551, 83 S. E. 577; Harr v. Ward (1904) 73 Ark. 437, 84 S. W. 496; Brown v. McIntyre (1864) 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 344; and Savage v. Brewer (1835) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 453, 28 Am. Dec. 255, in which the alleged malicious actions were instituted in a foreign country or another state, the mere fact that the civil action which is alleged to be the basis of an action for malicious prosecution was brought in a foreign jurisdiction seems to be immaterial, an action for malicious prosecution not being maintainable in such case, as in other cases, unless the defendant in the alleged malicious action was arrested or his property seized, or he suffered some special injury different from and in addition to that necessarily resulting from similar actions.

In Kramer v. Stock (1840) 10 Watts (Pa.) 115, which was an action on the case, the cause of action was alleged, in substance as follows: That the plaintiff offered to pay a note of his, held by the defendant, but the latter refused to receive the money and to deliver up the note; that afterwards he maliciously, intending to harass the plaintiff, sued him L.R.A.1917B.

on the note before a justice of the peace, having jurisdiction, whose office was 30 miles from the home of the plaintiff, who resided in a township in which there was a justice with jurisdiction of claims of the amount of the note, and that the plaintiff defended the action, which resulted in a judgment in the defendant's favor. The court held that while the conduct of the defendant was malicious and vexatious, an action would not lie therefor, as he had a right to refuse the tender, and was successful in the suit. As to the grievance alleged of the plaintiff being summoned before a magistrate out of his own township, and at a distance of 30 miles from his residence, the court said that there was nothing contrary to law in that, and that the plaintiff could not recover damages against the defendant for doing a legal act.

And in Woods v. Finnell (1878) 13 Bush (Ky.) 628, where the court held good a petition alleging, in substance, that the plaintiff and the defendant were citizens of the same county, that the latter, to annoy the former and subject him to unnecessary expense and trouble, left the county and went to another state, not for the purpose of residing there in good faith, but to enable him to institute an action against the plaintiff in the circuit court of the United States for the district of the plaintiff's state, held in a certain county (not that of the plaintiff's residence); that he maliciously and without probable cause instituted an action in such court which resulted in a judgment against him, and that plaintiff, by reason of the malicious institution of such action and its malicious prosecution, expended large sums of money,—it is stated in the opinion that if the defendant, at the time he left the county and claimed his residence in the other state, had a cause of action against the plaintiff, or any probable grounds for believing that a cause of action existed, he had the right to select the forum in which to prosecute it, and in such a case his removal from one jurisdiction to another, if for the avowed purpose of bringing the action, was not to be regarded as evidence of a want of probable cause; and that, having a cause of action, or probable cause for bringing it, he had the right to institute proceedings in any court having jurisdiction.

In Smith v. Michigan Buggy Co. (1896) 66 Ill. App. 516, it was held that a mere enticement of one into another state in order that process might there be served upon him, where there is detention of neither his person nor property, will not support an action for the malicious prosecution of the action so commenced. This case was affirmed in (1898) 175 Ill. 619, 67 Am. St. Rep. 242, 51 N. E. 569, without mention of the foregoing point.

But in Payne v. Donegan (1882) 9 Ill.

App. 566, it was held that a cause of action good in substance was set forth in a count in a declaration showing the bringing by the defendants maliciously and without probable cause, and in pursuance of an unlawful conspiracy between them to annoy, harass, and injure the plaintiff, and to obtain and extort money from him by persecution and abuse of legal process, a succession of suits before a justice of the peace, at a great distance from where all the parties resided, and then letting such suits be dismissed by the justice for want of prosecution, thus subjecting the plaintiff to annoyance and expense for which the taxable costs would be no adequate compensation. The court seems to intimate, in passing upon the sufficiency of other counts, that the mere bringing of a civil action against a person before a justice of the peace in a district distant from that of his residence, thus compelling him to go a great distance to defend such suit, would support an action for malicious prosecution. #### NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

ARVID NORDBY, Resp't.,

v.

O. J. SORLIE, Appt.

(— N. D. —, 160 N. W. 70.)

Highway — collision — negligence.

1. Plaintiff, riding a motorcycle, met defendant driving an automobile, and collided with the rear wheel of the auto just as it was turning out of plaintiff's half of the roadway. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $2,500 for alleged negligence of defendant, who appeals. Held, there is no proof that defendant was negligent.

For other cases, see Automobiles, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — contributory negligence.

2. Conceding that defendant was negligent, it is conclusively established by plaintiff's own testimony and by uncontroverted evidence that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence barring his recovery. For other cases, see Automobiles, II. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Headnotes by Goss, J.

For other aspects of the law as to rules of the road, consult the Indexes L.R.A.1917B.

Appeal — finding against evidence.

3. The finding by the jury that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence is contrary to all the admitted facts and to plaintiff's own proof, and cannot be upheld. A directed verdict of dismissal should have been ordered.

Messrs. Charles A. Lyche and Henry Leum for respondent.

Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assignments upon refusal to direct a verdict challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a $2,500 verdict against defendant as damages from a motorcycle and automobile collision.

Defendant resides at Buxton. On Sunday, July 12, 1914, with his family, he went by automobile 18 miles to Mayville, where a Chautauqua was being held. He left Mayville for home about 6 p. m. Two other autos, driven by Knudson and by Gunderson, left just ahead of Sorlie, running in that order. They met plaintiff coming on his motorcycle, 6 miles out. They were going east and plaintiff west. Less than a mile intervened between the lead machine of Knudson's and Sorlie's automobile. Plaintiff met and passed the autos of Knudson and Gunderson, overtook and passed a team, and then met and collided with Sorlie's machine. Plaintiff broke his leg necessitating its amputation. At the place of the accident, the main traveled roadway ran to the extreme left and north side of a wide-crowned but somewhat rough highway. From ditch to ditch the driveway was wide enough for three rigs abreast, but the traveled roadway ran well to the north side with ruts worn in by travel to a depth of 1½ inches as estimated by plaintiff's witnesses, to 3¼ inches according to defendant's measurements. Seeing plaintiff coming, defendant endeavored to turn out of the ruts, but succeeded in getting only his front wheels out, while the rear ones remained in them sliding along, but not mounting the rut so as to carry the rear of the machine over to the right, clearing plaintiff's half of the roadway. Seeing Sorlie turning out, plaintiff assumed that the auto would be out of the north track of the roadway, until too late to avoid striking the rear wheel.

Plaintiff assumes (1) that Sorlie was negligent in being upon the left side of the highway (although within the traveled roadway) instead of upon the untraveled right side of the highway; and (2) in not having his machine under control because of alleged high speed at which plaintiff claims Sorlie was traveling. Sorlie asserts that he had a right to be where he was, exactly in the route of ordinary travel, and hence was not negligent; and also that he was not driving at more than 15 miles an hour at the time, and was not negligent in any way, but was doing his utmost to get out of plaintiff's way when plaintiff dashed into his rig. And Sorlie claims that the uncontradicted testimony establishes conclusively that plaintiff caused his injury by his own contributory negligence in failing to slacken his speed or control his motorcycle while attempting to pass defendant at a high and excessive rate of speed.

The first contention that defendant was upon the wrong side of the highway, and that negligence based upon that fact alone can be assumed, is untenable. While the highway to the south might have been traveled had it been necessary to do so, it was not the generally traveled roadway, otherwise the ruts would not have been worn. The remainder of the highway was practically untraveled. As defendant was but traveling where all others drove, he was only doing what all others had done, and therefore could not have been negligent in merely following that roadway instead of a rougher one elsewhere. The very definition of "negligence" imports a departure from the usual conduct of the ordinary prudent individual; and, as Sorlie, in doing what he was and what others generally had done, was not departing from that standard, but instead only following it, the assumption of negligence assumed by plaintiff at the outset is erroneous and unsound.

Illustrative of this, the brief reads: "The defendant kept to the left in violation of the law of the road, and was following the spur next to the same ditch at the time of the collision. The plaintiff was on the right side of the highway, but the defendant was on the wrong side."

He has the words "left" and "wrong" italicized to emphasize their importance. For reasons stated, defendant was not on the "wrong" side of the highway, but was where he had a right to be, without any imputation of negligence being drawn from the fact that he was in the traveled roadway upon that portion of the highway. The jury should have been instructed as a matter of law that defendant was not negligent in being in the traveled roadway upon the highway.

And now to examine the other alleged negligence of defendant, and the contributory negligence charged against plaintiff: The two may best be considered jointly under a recitation of all the facts in evidence bearing on them.

Plaintiff had left Hillsboro at 6 or a quarter to 6, at approximately the same time that Sorlie and accompanying autos had left Mayville. During the time intervening before the collision plaintiff had run 16 miles. Sorlie had gone between 5 and 6 miles during the same period. Comparing distances and elapsed time, plaintiff must have traveled nearly three times as fast for that period as Sorlie had traveled. Plaintiff had gone north from Hillsboro through Taft and Cummings, going a mile out of his way and back between the latter place and the highway bearing straight into Mayville, a mile and a half ahead of the place of collision. His undisputed record of achievement of speed and its consequences from the time he left Hillsboro is in evidence. He met or passed half a dozen rigs and automobiles on the trip before the collision, and in every instance the drivers met or overtaken took to the ditch because of the excessive speed at which plaintiff came down upon and passed them. This is undisputed. The nearest plaintiff comes to contradicting it is that he did not notice or observe who he met or where they went.

Plaintiff testifies that he had a drink of whisky at 10 o'clock that forenoon, and that he had been to a beer party a mile out of Hillsboro until just before supper. He admitted having drunk at least four glasses of beer, and might have had five, as a keg of beer was on tap all that afternoon.

The first party Nordby met a mile and one-half or 2 miles north of Hillsboro on this eventful motorcycle ride was O. A. Hong, who was driving south in an auto. Here the first significant fact appears. Plaintiff approached and passed in the wrong track. Hong testifies: "I swung into the ditch on the east side to get out of his way. He was coming on the west side all along. It was around 6 o'clock, or possibly a few minutes after 6. I am not sure what time, but it was a little late for supper. . . . He was going at a pretty fast speed, did not give me any road, held the track on the west side of the road. I saw it was pretty fast speed, so I drove into the ditch to be sure I would clear him, and he went past me pretty fast."

The uncontroverted proof shows that at this particular point he was not only speeding, but coming on in the wrong track, where he did not belong. Had he collided with Hong, the latter would have been exonerated by plaintiff's contributory negligence.

He next met Holtz and Odegard, the latter driving, and this second machine, quoting Odegard's testimony, "went into the ditch. I had to go as far as I could to the west side of the road to give him the east side; happened to notice him coming, and that he was going rather fast." Holtz, riding with Odegard, says they remarked about plaintiff's speed, and that Odegard said, "Look at that fellow coming!" This statement, clearly admissible, was erroneously stricken out as hearsay. It was a part of the facts of the trip, the res under investigation. That the statement was made strongly evidences the unusual.

Holtz continues:

Well, he come up the road tearing, and Odegard turned out for him of course, in the ditch as far as he could get, and he come along the road just in this shape.

Q. Swinging back and forth?

A. Yes, and he was coming pretty fast, going from one side of the road to the other, as he was coming towards us.

Then plaintiff approached Dr. Knudson's auto, Gunderson's auto, Tolsby's team, and Sorlie's auto, all four rigs strung out behind one another and with Knudson's in the lead. The drivers and the occupants of all these rigs all agree that in every instance plaintiff did not slacken speed, but came down upon them and whizzed by them until he collided with the last car. Knudson noticed plaintiff coming a half mile east before he turned the corner, and had a good opportunity to observe and judge of L.R.A.1917B.

the speed at which plaintiff was approaching him. Knudson had driven cars for nine years, and when asked the question, "From your experience in driving motor vehicles, state to the jury your best judgment as to how fast this man on the motorcycle was coming at the time he passed you?" replied: "Well, it wasn't less than 40 miles an hour. . . ."

Q. Did he slow up any when he approached and passed your car?

A. No, sir.

Q. He went by apparently at the same speed as when he was far ahead of you?

A. Yes.

Mrs. Knudson says: "He came pretty fast. We turned out for him. He came pretty fast. I could hardly see him." And just as he went by she exclaimed: "Oh, my! He goes fast."

Oscar Hanson, riding in the front seat of Dr. Knudson's auto, testifies that his best judgment as to plaintiff's speed when he passed their car was "from 40 to 45 miles an hour."

Q. Did he seem to slow up as he approached your car?

A. No, he kept the same gait.

Q. State what you did as you approached him?

A. The doctor swung his car on the right into the ditch.

Q. Did you notice any exclamation by any one of those in the car as he passed you?

A. Yes, Mrs. Knudson hollered, "Oh, My!"

George Gunderson was driving some distance behind Knudson and ahead of Sorlie and also east of Tolsby's team. He had driven autos for two years.

He says that:

As he passed me I turned out in the ditch, and he went past me pretty fast.

Q. At the time he approached you as you met him, state whether or not he slowed up any.

A. He did not slow up.

Q. Was he using the same speed when he passed you, as far as you could tell, as he used when he was some distance ahead of you?

A. It looked that way.

Q. State whether or not you were off the traveled part of the road as you passed him?

A. Yes, I went off the road entirely.

Q. Did this man on the motorcycle make any attempt to turn out of the road or not?

A. No.

Gunder Ashiem, riding in Gunderson's car, gave similar testimony as to the way plaintiff approached and passed, and states his best estimate of the speed at which plaintiff passed their rig immediately ahead of Sorlie's as "about 60 miles an hour," and that he did not slow up. When asked, "What is the lowest you are positive he was running?" answers: "The lowest was about 40 miles, but I think he went 60. That is my honest opinion."

Carl Vigestrang, also riding in Gunderson's machine, likewise places plaintiff's speed at from "60 to 65 miles an hour," and adds: "When he passed our car, I looked back. I thought possibly he might take a tumble; he went so awful fast."

Plaintiff next overtook and passed Anton Tolsby going toward Mayville and only a short distance ahead of the point of collision. He also got off the road. He says, "I turned right out, right out through the ditch," and that plaintiff in going by him "went pretty fast, and I should judge 35 or 40 miles an hour, just right close to the horses. He kept the road and made no attempt to give me any room or turn out."

Sorlie was asked to describe the circumstances preliminary to the collision, and replies:

Just as the motorcycle got over the rise and as soon as I distinguished what it was, I started to turn out of the rut. I was in the rut, and I got the front wheels out of the rut, but the hind wheels slid in the rut, and I could not get them out, and before they got out he was there and struck the hind end of my machine.

Q. He passed the front of your machine safely?

A. Yes, the front was out, I got that out, and if the rest of the machine had gotten out when the front part came out we would have been out to clear the man easily.

That a few hundred feet ahead was a depression, the lowest part of which was over 8 feet below the level of the road leading to it upon which was Sorlie.

There is a plat in evidence made the next day by Sorlie and another, assisted by one of the defendant's present attorneys, made as a precautionary matter. The main general facts therein stated are not denied by plaintiff. It shows that the roadway in which was the auto was 15 feet upon the highway from the bottom of the so-called north ditch, and that 32 inches from the outside rut over toward the ditch the crowning portion of the highway had lowered only 2 inches from what it was at the edge of the roadway; and 5½ feet, or I.R.A.1917B.

nearly twice as far toward the ditch, it was but 3 inches lower than the traveled roadway. All witnesses except the plaintiff, including plaintiff's own witnesses, agree that there is no sudden drop or depression between the outer rut on the north side and the ditch on that side. And plaintiff testifies only from his impressions made hurriedly in his approach to Sorlie or while trying to pass. The measurements show the ditch to be only 17 inches deep, or a drop of only that much in the 15 feet from the north rut to the edge of the highway. The measurements actually taken tend to establish that plaintiff had ample room to pass without going into the ditch or even getting close to it, had he gotten out of the rut on that side.

Plaintiff testifies that his motorcycle that day "was running, but it wasn't running right. There was something wrong with the cylinders. It kind of bound in the cylinders," that he left Hillsboro "about 6 o'clock, or a little before." He describes his route; was going "at the time of this accident, I think, about 15 or 18 miles an hour."

Q. And can you tell and give the jury an idea about how fast the auto driven by Sorlie was going?

A. No, I hardly can. It seemed it was a good speed. I can't say how fast it was. [That he] was riding along on the right side till I met this fellow Sorlie.

Q. Tell the jury how it happened?

A. Well, just when I met him he was just turning the front wheels a little, I guess.

Q. Do you remember the collision? Do you remember coming together there?

A. Yes, just when we struck, just before the accident, he turned his front wheels out of the rut or tracks where the front wheels were, to the south of the road. [He had no speedometer on his motorcycle.]

Q. I want to ask you just how close to the traveled part of the road, the part of the road used for the wagons, was the north ditch?

A. There was just a few inches.

Q. About how many?

A. Probably a foot or so.

Q. Now, I want to ask you if there was a traveled portion to the south? Was there a road traveled over south?

A. It looks to have been traveled there, but not so much as on the other side.

Q. Where was the road the smoothest on the north track or on the south track?

A. The north track.

Q. When you saw this man on the north side of the road, the same side that you were on, why didn't you stop your motorcycle?

A. Of course, I expected him to turn out the same as them others did.

Q. Well, after you got nearer to him and saw he wasn't turning out, why didn't you stop your car (meaning motorcycle)?

A. I never had time to stop, and then, of course, he was coming awful fast and struck me like a bullet.

Q. Why didn't you get in the ditch?

A. The ditch was kind of deep on the north side. It was near square up and down, and I probably would kill myself to go out there.

Q. How far was your motorcycle from the ditch, as you were going along?

A. As close to the ditch as I possibly could.

Q. And you couldn't get by the machine?

A. No.

Q. Were you going as fast when you met Sorlie as you were when you met Dr. Knudson?

A. Of course, I see—I thought that—I didn't think he could control his auto, and when I saw that I turned the gasoline off, but it was too late.

Q. Turned it all off?

A. Yes, but it was too late to do anything. Of course, I couldn't do anything to save myself then before the strike.

The foregoing is all in response to his own counsel.

On cross-examination he testifies:

Q. Was there sufficient room there for you to pass if you had turned to the left of Sorlie's machine, as you wanted to?

A. Well, if I turned right away when I passed the second automobile.

Q. What is that?

A. When I passed the second automobile, I probably could; but I expected him to turn the same as everybody does, till it was too late.

As corroborative of plaintiff's statement that he was going at a low speed, he has offered the testimony of Johren, who saw plaintiff from a distance of a quarter of a mile, half a mile from the place of collision, and who says that his "best guess" was that when witness saw plaintiff the latter was making 18 or 20 miles an hour. Dunley, who had repaired the motorcycle some time before, said he had reduced the speed of it somewhat to take a knock out of it, so that it did not go as fast as a new one, but that he could not tell what speed it would develop. And one Lerum also testified that the north rut was 1½ inches or so deep and only about a foot from the ditch L.R.A.1917B.

on that side. This fairly and accurately states the testimony upon which the jury found that Sorlie was negligent, and that his negligence contributed to plaintiff's injury, and that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

It is impossible to read the record without coming to the conclusion that the facts were that plaintiff was running at a high rate of speed from Hillsboro to the scene of the accident, and with little regard to his own safety or the safety or rights of others. Without exception, every rig he passed went into the ditch to avoid him. It is significant, also, that everybody he met noticed that Nordby was going "awful fast," and that several of them remarked about it; and that all agree that at no time did he slow up as he approached, but "whizzed" by at full speed. The distance that he had come in the elapsed time is corroborative proof of sustained excessive speed. He does not claim to have turned out or slowed up, not even in meeting Sorlie, except, as he says, "when it was too late;" and that he claims was because of Sorlie's speed, not his own. If plaintiff was insensible to his own speed, it was but natural for him to believe that Sorlie, and not himself, was speeding; but, had he struck any other of the half dozen rigs he passed before colliding with Sorlie, under the proof he would have been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. And that he was making no exception as to Sorlie is proven by his own statement that he expected him to get out of the way "as them others had done." An accident prevented Sorlie from being out of his way. The condition of the road kept him in the way, and plaintiff dashed into his rear wheel. The physical, admitted, and uncontroverted fact that he safely passed the front wheel and the side of the auto and struck the hub of the hind wheel demonstrates that the auto must have been attempting to get out of the rut and must have been standing at considerable of a diverging angle to his roadway. This corroborates Sorlie and is substantiated by plaintiff's own testimony that he saw Sorlie turning the front wheels out of the ruts. Sorlie in this position must have been going slow, or, as he says, he would have been out of the roadway or overturned.

Eliminating, as we must, the fact that Sorlie was on the north side of the road, the proof discloses that he did nothing negligent, neither did he omit to do anything that a reasonably prudent man could have done to avoid the accident. Admitting for the sake of further analysis plaintiff's testimony that Sorlie appeared unable to control his machine and because thereof was negligent, and that the same contributed to the accident, nevertheless under the undisputed facts and every reasonable inference therefrom, and from plaintiff's own testimony and admissions, plaintiff was guilty of want of control, and therefore guilty of contributory negligence. He says he made no attempt to get out of the rut, and the only reason he gives for it was, "I probably would kill myself to go on there," i. e., to his right and into the ditch, which he says in the same breath "was pretty near square up and down." It can be assumed that the situation in which he had placed himself was a dangerous one, yet the very situation conclusively proves that he had no control over his machine. When he had shut off the gasoline, he was too close to the approaching automobile to avoid collision. It is a self-evident fact that, had he been in control and using the degree of care required of him, he with safety could have either run his machine into the ditch or have alighted therefrom. That he could do neither establishes his negligence when attempting to pass the approaching vehicle. The condition of the road or its ruts does not alter his duty to use care. The statute means what it says, in § 2976L, Comp. Laws 1913, that, "no person shall operate a motor vehicle on the public highways at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the width, conditions and use of the highway at the time and the general and usual rules of the road, or so as to endanger property or the life or limbs of any person."

Plaintiff was bound to regard the width, condition, and use made of this highway at that point, as well as the rules of the road, and could not without negligence on his part rely entirely upon Sorlie's getting out of his track "the same as them other ones had done" all the way from Hillsboro there. He could not expect others to have more regard for his safety than he had himself. It was his duty to have his machine under control when passing.

True, it was Sorlie's duty to use reasonable diligence to obey the rules of the road and clear for the plaintiff the north pathway of the roadway; but the law does not make Sorlie an insurer of his ability to do so, as "the width, condition, and use of the highway at the time" are to be considered with the rules of the road in that respect. To hold otherwise would make him an insurer against the results of unavoidable accident, as well as culpable negligence of the approaching party, and announce a rule of law that would permit an approaching vehicle like plaintiff's to dash ahead at full speed reckless of road conditions, with the other party an insurer against such recklessness. The duties owing by each driver toward the other are reciprocal, equal, and alike, with no advantage of one over the other, under the law and the rules of the road. It is clear from plaintiff's testimony that he failed to realize that he owed any such reciprocal duty to Sorlie, but instead assumed that the latter must get out of his track in any event and would do so, and that he was excused from exercising any care for his own safety. Plaintiff was bound in law to be in a position to allow Sorlie time to get out of his track, as admittedly he was endeavoring to do. If plaintiff's recovery can be sustained under this proof, it is hard indeed to conceive of such a case where a recovery would not be upheld. When, from out of plaintiff's own mouth, accompanied by the unquestioned and undenied proof of his previous and almost contemporaneous successive acts of culpable negligence establishing his wanton recklessness for the entire trip until he struck Sorlie, and when he might have received the same injury from any of the others had it not been for their exercise of undue care toward him, coupled with the reasonable probability that his conduct was the result of a mind more or less dulled into insensibility of speed or danger from the admitted use of a considerable amount of intoxicants that afternoon, together with as nearly conclusive proof by Sorlie that he did no act upon which negligence could be based as can in ordinary probability usually be established by proof,—when all of this is considered, to affirm this recovery is to close one's eyes to every reasonable probability and established fact, and, because a verdict has been found, announce a precedent that will in practical effect make every automobile driver or owner, at the whim of a careless jury, the absolute and unqualified insurer against, not his own negligence, but that of every vehicle that attempts to pass another in however a negligent manner. It is true that a jury has passed upon the facts, but it is equally true that in doing so it must have closed its eyes to the facts and any and all reasonable inferences from them.

And the paucity of plaintiff's proof as set forth in his own brief well illustrates the extreme to which plaintiff's counsel has been driven in his attempt to uphold this verdict and establish his major premise that all the evidence without contradiction does not favor defendant. He calls attention to what he claims was the fact that "plaintiff had no difficulty in meeting or passing vehicles on the highway, other than the defendant's auto." The reason is plainly apparent from the proof. Of course he did not, because, under the uncontroverted proof, every vehicle without exception took to the ditch in meeting him or when overtaken by him. He says "his motorcycle was not in condition to develop speed on that day." To find this to be fact would ignore the established fact that plaintiff had gone more than twice as far as Sorlie in the same length of time, as well as also to overlook the testimony of ten witnesses estimating plaintiff's speed immediately preceding the accident (and all of which testimony is undenied by plaintiff himself) variously at from 35 to 65 miles an hour, and corroborated by contemporaneous occurrences and remarks made.

And in the same way plaintiff's statement that he was not riding to exceed 15 or 18 miles an hour on meeting Sorlie is condemned as untrue by the facts surrounding the accident, and that he failed to alight or turn out and thus avoid injury. It was impossible for Sorlie to have been going at an excessive speed from the admitted position of his auto, partly in the ruts and partly out, when plaintiff was approaching, immediately preceding as well as at the time of the collision; also disposing of plaintiff's testimony that defendant was coming "awful fast" and "struck him like a bullet." The comparison was misapplied; plaintiff was the bullet.

Plaintiff lays emphasis upon the proposition that questions of credibility were for the jury, and has attempted to discredit about all of defendant's witnesses by reason of friendship, acquaintance, or association with Sorlie. Of course, credibility was for the jury. But the main and decisive facts are out of the mouth of the plaintiff or stand admitted.

When the motion for a directed verdict of dismissal was made at the close of the case with the entire history of plaintiff's trip that day in evidence and undenied, taken with plaintiff's own testimony, there was no issue for the jury upon whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. A finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence cannot be upheld. The case should have been dealt with accordingly. The judgment and order appealed from are ordered reversed, and judgment of dismissal of this action is ordered.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due upon a five-year lease of certain real property. Reversed.

Statement by Burnett, J.:

This is an action to recover sundry monthly instalments of rent alleged to be due upon a five-year lease of real property in Portland, the execution of which and possession thereunder being admitted. That anything is due is denied. Answering affirmatively, the defendant alleged, in substance, that he was the principal stockholder in a firm of architects engaged in the business of building apartment houses and family dwellings; that oral negotiations were entered into between the defendant and the agent of plaintiff for the erection upon the real property of the latter of an apartment house containing 71 rooms, to be leased to the defendant for the term of five years at the rate of $8 per room per month; that before the negotiations were completed and the lease finally executed the plaintiff's agent falsely represented to the defendant that a third party had offered to take a lease for that term at the rate of $10 per room per month, in which event, if accepted, the defendant firm would not be allowed to construct the building; that this representation was made for the purpose of inducing the defendant to agree to the larger rental; that relying upon the statement mentioned, and believing it to be true, the defendant agreed to the lease in question at the larger rental, and, as he says, "will be obliged for the remainder of the term of said lease to pay the sum of $2 per room per month more than he had agreed with said agent to pay for the same, or than said plaintiff was offered for same, or could have then or now receive from any other person therefor, or than same was then or is now worth, and defendant was, has been, and is damaged by reason thereof and thereby in the sum of $8,520." A demurrer to the further and separate answer on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of defense to the complaint or counterclaim against the plaintiff, and that the defendant's cause of action set forth as a counterclaim did not accrue within two years prior to the commencement of this action, nor within two years prior to L.R.A.1917B.

the filing of the counterclaim, was overruled. Every allegation in the new matter of the answer was denied by the reply, except as expressly admitted therein. It admits that the agent was authorized to negotiate for and find a tenant for an apartment house to be erected on the property, and to negotiate for proposals to construct the same, but that he was not authorized to enter into such a lease, nor to conclude the contract for the construction of the building; that the defendant proposed to the agent to take a lease on the building to be erected for five years on the basis of $8 per room per month, but that the proposal was never accepted. It also admits that the agent represented that the third party had made an offer for a lease running for the same term at $10 per room per month, and avows that the plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that the offer had, in fact, been made; and, lastly, affirmatively avers the defense of the Statute of Limitations, for that it appears that the alleged fraud was perpetrated April 11, 1910, whereas the answer was not filed until more than two years after that date. A general demurrer to the new matter in the reply was sustained apparently on the ground that the questions involved had been settled by the ruling on the demurrer to the allegations of the answer. During the progress of the trial, over the objection of the plaintiff, the defendant was allowed to amend his answer so as to call it set-off and recoupment instead of counterclaim, and by changing the prayer to the effect that the plaintiff take nothing and defendant be dismissed with his costs and disbursements. The jury found a special verdict to the effect that the statement of the agent that the third party had offered $10 per month was false, that defendant in taking the lease relied upon that offer, and that but for the offer he would have secured it at a rental of $575 per month for the whole building; and as a general verdict the jury found for the defendant. From the judgment rendered on this verdict, the plaintiff appeals.

Burnett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complaint is made about permitting the amendment of the answer. It is not shown, however, that the plaintiff was taken by surprise or that her rights were prejudiced thereby. She could not have experienced any injury on that account; for whereas the original answer demanded a judgment for the excess of the damages alleged over what should be found due to the plaintiff by the terms of the lease, the change allowed her to escape any judgment for this possible overplus. Neither can the Statute of Limitations be urged against a mere defense of the kind here involved. Our statute stating the time within which actions may be brought refers to instances where the party claiming to have been defrauded institutes proceedings on his own behalf of the recovery of damages. It does not contemplate mere resistance of a claim founded upon a contract into which the defendant has been inveigled by the fraudulent conduct of the other contracting party. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, 58 Pac. 910: "It is also true that, where a party seeks relief upon the ground of fraud or mistake, the action must be commenced within three years after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake; but a different case is presented where the party who has procured the fraudulent contract, or who seeks to take advantage of it, asks to have it declared valid or to enforce its executory terms, and is thus himself asking affirmative relief. The three-years' Statute of Limitations does not bar the defendant in such a case from objecting to the validity or to the enforcement of the contract upon the ground of fraud. It is not incumbent upon one who has thus been defrauded to go into court and ask relief, but he may abide his time, and, when enforcement is sought against him, excuse himself from performance by proof of the fraud."

To like effect are the cases of Evans v. Duke, 140 Cal. 22, 73 Pac. 732; State ex rel. American Freehold-Land Mortg. Co. v. Tanner, 45 Wash. 348, 88 Pac. 321; Advance Thresher Co. v. Doak, 36 Okla. 532, 120 Pac. 736. The injured party is not bound to presume that his adversary will at all events endeavor to enforce the contract which is corrupted with his own fraud, at least beyond what would be justly his due. A wronged individual may safely rest on a mere defense grounded upon the deceit of the other party so long as the contract itself is liable to be enforced. The taint is inherent in the agreement, and, as a defense, will last as long as the convention it affects.

The most difficult question to be determined is whether or not the false representation that the third party had offered $10 per month is material and vitiates the contract or is a basis of damage pro tanto. That the representation was false is established by the special verdict of the jury beyond our power to investigate. So far as the precise question thus presented is concerned, it is new in this state. There are many authorities which sustain the position of plaintiff. The argument is stated in Williams v. McFadden, 23 Fla. 143, 11 Am. St. Rep. 345, 1 So. 618, as follows: "To entitle a party to maintain an action for deceit by means of false representations, he must, among other things, show that the defendant made false and fraudulent assertions in regard to some fact or facts material to the transaction in which he was defrauded, by means of which he was induced to enter into it. The misrepresentation must relate to alleged facts, or to the condition of things as then existent. It is not every misrepresentation relating to the subject matter of the contract which will render it void or enable the aggrieved party to maintain an action for deceit. It must be as to matters of fact, substantially.

affecting his interests, not as to matters of opinion, judgment, probability, or expectation,"—citing 3 Sutherland, Damages, 484, and Long v. Woodman, 58 Me. 49.

The reasoning seems to be that the representation does not affect or pretend to affect the intrinsic qualities of the property under consideration; that the statement of the offer of the third party is but another way of saying that he has an opinion that the value is so much; that opinions are not material, and may be set down as "trader's talk." A fair statement of the rule relied upon by the plaintiff is found in Beare v. Wright, 14 N. D. 26, 69 L.R.A. 409, 103 N. W. 632, 8 Ann. Cas. 1057: "It is apparent that the representation as to what others paid for the stock did not affect its value. It has not been found that there were any fiduciary relations existing between the parties, or that there were any other facts or circumstances giving rise to an implied agreement that the price paid by the vendor or others should be the price to the plaintiff. It is not found or admitted that there was any express contract to that effect. In the absence of special circumstances of that nature, a mere false statement as to the price paid by the vendor or others is not actionable deceit,"—citing many authorities.

Again, in Cole v. Smith, 26 Colo. 506, 58 Pac. 1086, the court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice Campbell, says: While "a statement by the vendor that property cost him a certain sum of money is not a mere expression of opinion, but a statement of fact which, if relied upon and proved to be false, may be a ground for rescinding a contract entered into upon the faith of it, it is quite uniformly held that a statement by a vendor that he has been offered a certain sum for his property, or that it is of any given value, are not such representations of fact as to be the foundation of an action."

In Dingle v. Trask, 7 Colo. App. 16, 42 Pac. 186, a creditor of a merchant falsely stated to him that another creditor was about to attach the property of the merchant, and so induced the latter to give him a mortgage upon his goods. The court held that this false statement did not constitute ground for an action of deceit looking to the cancellation of the mortgage. In Dillman v. Nadlehofer, 119 Ill. 567, 7 N. E. 88, it was held that a false statement by the defendant that he had been offered $25,000 for a certain patent furnished no ground for rescission of the contract induced by this statement. In Noetling v. Wright, 72 Ill. 390, the syllabus says: "A purchaser cannot maintain an action against his vendor for false statements in regard to the value of the property purchased, or its good qualities, or the price he has been offered for it."

Like cases are these: Hauk v. Brownell, 120 Ill. 161, 11 N. E. 416; Boles v. Merrill, 173 Mass. 491, 73 Am. St. Rep. 308, 53 N. E. 894; Holbrook v. Connor, 11 Am. Rep. 212, 60 Me. 578; Hemmer v. Cooper, 8 Allen, 334; Page v. Parker, 43 N. H. 363, 80 Am. Dec. 172, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 544; Mackenzie v. Seeberger, 22 C. C. A. 83, 40 U. S. App. 188, 76 Fed. 108; Brown v. Castles, 11 Cush. 348.

Even upon authorities holding that the simple representation, falsely made, of an offer for the property being sold, will not vitiate the contract, many exceptions have been engrafted in the progress of time. For instance, where the party making the representation has or affects to have superior knowledge as to the value of the property, while the other party is ignorant and relies upon the statement thus made, or where the property is at a distance so great that it is impracticable for the buyer to examine the same, the representation is held to be material, and its falsity will avoid the contract. On the theory that a statement of an offer is but the expression of some other man's opinion, this court has restricted the doctrine in Olston v. Oregon Water Power & R. Co. 52 Or. 343, 96 Pac. 1095, 97 Pac. 538, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 915, note, where it is held that a statement of an opinion is necessarily based on a fact, or carries with it such an inference that it can be interpreted as a statement of fact, and where it is known to be false, and made with intent to deceive, it may be actionable.

On the other hand, there are many authorities indicating that the trend of judicial thought is toward the doctrine that, where a falsehood is uttered in a manner calculated to and which does swerve the judgment of a reasonably prudent man under all the circumstances, it will work the destruction of the contract or an award of damages in favor of the injured party. If, notwithstanding the deceit, he makes an independent investigation of the matter, and through that method forms his judgment and decision, he must abide by the resultant contract, under the doctrine of Wimer v. Smith, 22 Or. 469, 30 Pac. 416, for thus it is made to appear that he did not rely upon the cozenage of the other party. The case of Strickland v. Graybill, 97 Va. 602, 34 S. E. 475, directly holds the doctrine that a false representation about the offer of another directly affects the value of the property in question. So do Ives v. Carter, 24 Conn. 392, and Seamen v. Becar, 15 Misc. 616, 38 N. Y. Supp. 69. Cases like Prescott v. Brown, 30 Okla. 428, 120 Pac. 991, Stauffer v. Hulwick, 176 Ind. 410, 96

N. E. 154, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 951; Kehl v. Abram, 210 Ill. 218, 71 N. E. 347, 102 Am. St. Rep. 158, Fottler v. Moseley, 179 Mass. 295, 60 N. E. 788, and Chisum v. Huggins, — Okla. —, 154 Pac. 1146, are all complicated more or less with fiduciary relations existing between the parties, or ignorance of the defrauded party, who relies upon the superior knowledge of the other, or where opportunity to examine the property has been denied to the one who suffers from the fraud. A valuable case with an exhaustive note appended is Kohl v. Taylor, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, reported also in 62 Wash. 678, 114 Pac. 874.

We think the better argument may be thus stated: The ground for saying that an opinion as to value is negligible is that it is impossible to prove the falsity of a mere matter of judgment about which honest men may reasonably differ. But even this rule has been restricted as above stated. The reason, however, fails when a statement is made of a fact the truth of which may be demonstrated or disproved. In the present instance the third party either made the offer or he did not make it. That fact is capable of proof or refutation. There can be no honest difference of opinion about whether or not he made the offer. Again, the statement of the fact of the offer at the increased price was made for the purpose of inducing the defendant to agree to the higher price. It was intended to operate in that direction, and whether or not it did have that effect is for the jury to determine. If demonstrable falsehood has been used to induce the execution of a contract in a manner calculated in the judgment of a jury to influence the decision of a reasonably prudent man under all the circumstances, it is sufficient to defeat the agreement, at the election of the injured party. Under such conditions the court will not busy itself to determine how much untruth may be injected into a transaction without spoiling it. It is wrong to lie, and a person who has thus set a trap for the other party cannot be heard to complain that the latter should not have walked into the snare. It better comports with common honesty to condemn falsehood as a means of constructing a contract. There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the answer on that ground.

It remains for us to consider to what extent the recoupment urged by the defendant shall be allowed to prevail in this action. This is not an action to rescind the contract. On the contrary, the defendant proceeds in affirmance of the agreement, does not allege a return of the property which he received under the lease, but as originally framed demands an affirmative L.R.A.1917B.

judgment for damages in excess of what remained due on the rent. The amendment whereby he waives such a judgment and uses his claim for damages as a mere defense does not alter the case. Recoupment, as defined by Mr. Justice Moore in Krausse v. Greenfield, 61 Or. 502, 507, 123 Pac. 392, 394, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 115, is the keeping back or stopping something which is due. He says: "Under the principles of the common law, 'recoupment' could be invoked when the defendant sustained damages by reason of the plaintiff's nonperformance of his part of the contract sued on, in which case the damages to which the defendant was entitled could be abated from the plaintiff's claim."

The question then is: By what rule shall it be determined how much the defendant is entitled to hold back from the amount due on the rent, conceding, as we must under the verdict, that he was imposed upon by the fraud of plaintiff's agent? The plaintiff requested and the court refused the following instructions to the jury: "If you believe from the evidence that the rental under this lease was a reasonable rental at the time the lease was entered into, taking into consideration the rents then prevailing, you must allow defendant nothing on his counterclaim. If you find for defendant on his counterclaim, you should determine how much less valuable this lease was to defendant than if Phil Gevurtz had made the offer of $10 per room as represented, and allow such amount to defendant as his damages. In assessing damages, if any are assessed, you are not to take into consideration any decrease in the rental value of the property which has occurred since April 11, 1910, the date of this lease, for plaintiff could not be charged with any loss accruing to defendant by a decline in the rental value."

It appears from the record that the plaintiff offered to prove what was the reasonable rental value of the building at the time the defendant took the lease, but this offer was denied, over the plaintiff's exception. The theory adopted by the court is embodied substantially in this instruction to the jury: "There can be no middle ground in this case on the question of the amount of damages defendant has sustained, if any. If you find the issues in favor of the defendant, then your duty would be to ascertain the amount of credit he was entitled to. In doing this you must find from the evidence one of two possible facts: Either that defendant could and would have secured said lease at a rental of $575 per month but for said alleged false representation, or, on the other hand, that he could and would not. If you find the fact to be that defendant would have secured said lease at the monthly rental of $575 per month but for said representation, defendant has been damaged to the extent of $135 per month for five years, and your verdict should in such case be for defendant; but if you fail to so find, then plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for the sum of $6,515.-05."

The sum of $575 alluded to in this instruction was what the defendant claims was orally agreed upon as the rental of the building per month prior to the execution of the written lease.

As a standard for the measurement of damages the oral negotiations of the parties must be laid out of the case because of the provisions of § 808 L. O. L. It is there stated: "In the following cases the agreement is void unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his lawfully authorized agent; evidence, therefore, of the agreement shall not be received other than the writing, or secondary evidence of its contents, in the cases prescribed by law: . . . 6. An agreement for the leasing, for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of real property, or of any interest therein. . . ."

This enactment, more stringent in its terms than most Statutes of Fraud in other states, not only says that an oral agreement is void, but goes further, and interdicts any evidence of such a convention. For the purposes of this case, therefore, the oral testimony about what was offered for the lease on the one hand and accepted on the other is utterly of no value whatever.

It is stated by Mr. Justice Bean, in Robertson v. Frey, 72 Or. 590, 804, 144 Pac. 130: "The general rule of damages in cases of fraud is that the party defrauded is entitled to recover the amount of the loss caused by the fraud of the other party, or damages adequate to the injury which he has sustained. The recovery must be limited to the actual loss. 20 Cyc. 130. There are a great number of cases in which the rule is stated that the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the thing purchased and the price paid; or, in case of exchange, the difference between the value of that with which the injured party was fraudulently induced to part and what he received."

In Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 279, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 159, there was before the court a case wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages which he had suffered by reason of the purchase of stock in a corporation, induced by false and fraudulent representations made to him by the defendant, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said: "If the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of the fraudulent and false representations alleged, and that the purchase of stock had been made in reliance thereon, then the defendant was liable to respond in such damages as naturally and proximately resulted from the fraud. He was bound to make good the loss sustained, such as the moneys the plaintiff had paid out and interest, and any other outlay legitimately attributable to defendant's fraudulent conduct; but this liability did not include the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation. The reasonable market value, if the property had been as represented, afforded, therefore, no proper element of recovery. Nor had the contract price the bearing given to it by the court. What the plaintiff paid for the stock was properly put in evidence, not as the basis of the application of the rule in relation to the difference between the contract price and the market or actual value, but as establishing the loss he had sustained in that particular. If the stock had a value in fact, that would necessarily be applied in reduction of the damages."

The matter may be likened to a statement of account between the parties wherein the defendant's gross damages may be set down as the amount of rent which he agreed to pay. With this he must be credited. In reduction of this he must be charged with the reasonable value of that which he received. If the value of what he has received is less than or equal to the amount of gross damages, the verdict should be for the defendant under the present form of the pleading; but, if the value of what he received is greater than his gross damage, the verdict should be for the plaintiff in the amount of the difference. The written lease, affirmed as it is by the defendant, is the contract by which the parties must be bound, subject to abatement in damages by reason of fraud alleged to have been practised on the defendant. To refer to the oral convention said to have been had between the parties as a standard for fixed damages would be to make a new contract for them and to install as a rule governing their conduct what the statute says is utterly void and beyond the pale of testimony. The defendant may have been outwitted in the contest over the price to be paid; but it does not follow that because the plaintiff was at fault we must violate the Statute of Frauds and establish a contract which the parties did not make and which the law says is null and of no effect. In correcting the balance of the scale disturbed by the fraud of the plaintiff, we must not go as far the other way beyond the reasonable value of the property which he received. The question about the abatement of the rental value must therefore be decided by what is the difference between what the defendant agreed to pay and the reasonable value of what he received as of the date the contract was made. He took his chances about fluctuation in the market value of rents, and a subsequent decline cannot affect the case. If, indeed, the rent was reasonably worth the stipulated price, or if he has himself recouped his loss, he has no cause of complaint, for damages can be awarded only to one who has been really injured.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM T. GRINNELL, Appt.,

v.

EDWARD WILKINSON.

(— R. I. —, 98 Atl. 103.)

Appeal — dismissal of action — question open.

1. Upon appeal from an order dismissing a petition for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act because the injury occurred out of the state, so that the statute did not apply, the question whether or not the decree is against the evidence is not open.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. 1, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Master and servant — workmen's compensation — injury out of state.

2. A Workmen's Compensation Act will apply to injuries to workmen employed in the state and injured while temporarily out of its limits in the performance of their duties unless there is something in its terms making it inapplicable, and a provision that the injured employee shall at reasonable times during his disability, if requested by his employers, submit himself to examination by a physician authorized to practise under the laws of the state, is not sufficient for that purpose.

Compensation Act to recover compensation for injuries received while in defendant's employ. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Breaden and Edward W. Bradford for appellant.

Mr. Ernest P. B. Atwood for appellee.

Parkhurst, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for compensation under Pub. Laws, chap. 831, 1912, commonly known as the "Workmen's Compensation Act." The petitioner alleges and the answer admits that the parties were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The petitioner was employed by respondent as a carpenter, and his employment commenced at Providence, in the course whereof he was directed by his employer to go without the state, to New Haven, in the state of Connecticut, to complete work already commenced by him at Providence. While so engaged at New Haven he claimed to have received a splinter in his finger, on the 20th day of May, 1915, and that, as a result of receiving said splinter in the middle finger of his right hand, blood poisoning set in, from which he has never recovered. The petitioner claims that he personally brought the attention of his employer to his injury at the hospital, within a period of thirty days from the occurrence of the accident. The petition was heard before the presiding justice of the superior court at Providence, and denied for the reason, substantially, that the statute does not apply because the injury was received outside this state. The matter is before this court on an appeal duly taken by the petitioner from the decision of the presiding justice.

The question to be decided is whether our statute gives to an employee whose contract of service is within its scope the right to recover compensation for injuries resulting from an accident in the state of Connecticut. The petitioner in his reasons of appeal says that the decree appealed from "is against the evidence and the weight thereof." But the presiding justice, ruling as above against the petitioner, and dismissing the petition solely on the point of law stated, made no findings of fact upon the evidence adduced before him; this court, therefore, has before it upon this appeal only the question of law involved in the decision above referred to; it has no jurisdiction under the act to try and determine the facts of the case. Petitioner's counsel offered no argument upon this point; the argument on this point on behalf of the respondent by his counsel is disregarded for the reasons stated.

Since acts relating to workmen's compensation are of comparatively recent date in this country, the precise question raised in this case has been presented to the courts of this country in comparatively few instances, and quite recently. The presiding justice, in his rescript dismissing this petition, cites only four cases, viz., Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60; Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620; Hotez v. International Mercantile Marine Co. 83 Misc. 25, 144 N. Y. Supp. 355, and Tomalin v. Pearson [1909] 2 K. B. 61, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 863, 25 Times L. R. 477, 100 L. T. 685, 2 B. W. C. C. 1. Of these cases Johnson v. Nelson is a Minnesota case decided January 8, 1915, and simply holds, substantially, that the plaintiff was an employee whose contract of service related only to work in Wisconsin and was carried out in that state, where he was injured, and that both he and his employer were subject to the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Wisconsin, and that his right of recovery was governed thereby, but the sole remedy of the plaintiff was under the Wisconsin act, and that he could not recover in Minnesota. This case has no bearing upon the question here under consideration.

The case of Hotez v. International Mercantile Marine Co. 83 Misc. 25, 144 N. Y. Supp. 355 (1913), was for a marine tort, where the complaint charged negligence attempted to be imputed to the owner of a vessel through a subordinate officer. The case was in tort for negligence, and it was held that the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York did not cover the case of torts committed without the state, and that the action could not be maintained as a common-law action under the evidence. This case has no application to the case at bar.

The case of Tomalin v. Pearson, supra, in the court of appeal for England relates to the English Workmen's Compensation Act, and holds that an employee injured in work done at Malta under contract with a British employer has no right of recovery, under the English act, which by its terms, as interpreted by the English court, covers only injuries received within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. This construction is based principally upon the fact that there is no express language in the act to cover injuries suffered outside the United Kingdom, except in case of a limited class of seamen; and it appears to be held that this express extension to a limited class of seamen is evidence of an intention on the part of Parliament to limit the effect of the act otherwise as above stated. See also Hicks v. Maxton, 124 L. T. Jo. 135, 1 B. W. C. C. 150; Schwartz v. India Rubber, Gutta Percha & Teleg. Works Co. [1912] 2 K. B. 299, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 780, 106 L. T. N. S. 706, 28 Times L. R. 331, 5 B. W. C. C. 390, where the English act is held not to apply to foreign injuries.

The leading case in this country up to 1913 was Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60, decided September 12, 1913, and it was doubtless upon this authority that the presiding justice relied in his decision, and he is, at first sight, apparently supported thereby. Since that time, however, certain other cases have been decided which, in the opinion of this court, more closely apply to our act and which we shall later discuss. Gould's Case, supra, was a petition under the Massachusetts act. The petitioner was a citizen resident of Massachusetts, and made a contract of service with a Massachusetts corporation, and accepted the benefits of the act. "In the course of his employment he received the injury out of which this claim arises, in the state of New York. He was principally employed in Massachusetts, but at times incidentally worked in New York and other states." After discussing certain incidental questions of practice which are not here material, the court proceeds to discuss the construction of the act, and while conceding that the legislature has power, if it sees fit, to give the act such scope as to cover injuries received outside the state, finds no express words giving it such scope, which is deemed to be significant, and then proceeds to examine its provisions in detail to see whether there is any intent to be gathered therefrom to make the act apply to such injuries. At page 484 of 215 Mass. the court says: "A consideration of the act in detail fails to disclose any plain intent to that end. On the contrary, several provisions indicate solely intrastate operation. Part 2, § 19, provides that the employee who has received an injury shall submit himself on request to an examination 'by a physician or surgeon authorized to practise medicine under the laws of the commonwealth.' It hardly can be inferred from this language that the legislature intended that physicians or surgeons from Massachusetts should journey to the place of injury, or that those authorized to practise under the laws of other states should make the examination. Part 3 of the act, which relates to procedure, and which, as has been pointed out, creates a wholly new method of procedure, deals only with boards and courts within this commonwealth. No provision is made for enforcing rights as to injuries occurring outside the state. Part 3, § 7, as amended by Stat. 1912, chap. 571, § 12, requires that the hearings of the committee on arbitration 'be held in the city or town where the injury occurred.' Obviously, this cannot relate to injuries received outside this commonwealth. Section 11, as amended by Stat. 1912, chap. 571, § 14, provides that in the event of resort to the courts, copies of the papers shall be presented 'to the superior court for the county in which the injury occurred or for the county of Suffolk.' The words 'for the county of Suffolk' may be presumed to be inserted for convenience, as the offices of the Industrial Accident Board are in Suffolk and courts are continually in session in that county, and not in order to make provision for injuries occurring outside the state. Part 3, § 18, requires the employer, within forty-eight hours, not counting Sundays and legal holidays, after the accident resulting in personal injury, to make a report 'in writing to the Industrial Accident Board.' Part 4, § 18, authorizes the directors of the Massachusetts Employees' Insurance Association created by the act, to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations for the prevention of injuries on the premises of the subscribers, 'and for this purpose the inspectors of the association shall have free access to all such premises during regular working hours.' This section is in furtherance of that part of the purpose of the act as set forth in its title for the prevention of industrial injuries. But it cannot be operative outside of Massachusetts."

From these various provisions of the Massachusetts act the court finds an intent to confine the operation of the act to accidental injuries happening in the state, and that it is not applicable to injuries arising out of the state. On page 488 of 215 Mass. the court says: "If employees and employers from different states carry their domiciliary personal-injury law with them into other jurisdictions, confusion would ensue in the administration of the law, and at least the appearance of inequality among those working under similar conditions. If such a result had been intended by the general court, it cannot be doubted that it would have been disclosed in unambiguous words."

These remarks do not seem to be applicable to the case before the court, but seem to be used arguendo, in the general discussion of the scope and intent of such acts generally. In this state we have found no difficulty such as that last referred to in the administration of the law; for in the case of Pendar v. H. & B. American Mach. Co. 35 R. I. 321, L.R.A.1916A, 428, 37 Atl. 1, 4 N. C. C. A. 600 (1913), a case of an injury which occurred in Massachusetts to a citizen of Rhode Island who was employed in Massachusetts by a corporation which had taken the benefit of the act in that state, we held that "where an accident occurred in a foreign jurisdiction, under whose laws plaintiff waived his right to bring a common-law action to recover by failing to give notice in writing to his employer at the time of the hiring that he claimed his right to bring such action, plaintiff cannot bring in this state an action at common law to recover for the injury."

See also Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620 (1915); Albanese v. Stewart, 78 Misc. 581, 138 N. Y. Supp. 942; Schweitzer v. Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt Actien Gesellschaft, 149 App. Div. 900, 134 N. Y. Supp. 812; Schweitzer v. Hamburg-American Line, 78 Misc. 448, 138 N. Y. Supp. 944.

Returning now to the specific provisions of the Massachusetts act above referred to in the quotation from Gould's Case, supra, upon which the court principally relies to support its finding that the Massachusetts act was intended to apply solely to injuries received within that state, we find only two of these provisions which are the same in substance as are certain provisions of the act of this state. The first of these is the provision that the employee "shall, after an injury, at reasonable times during the continuance of his disability, if so requested by his employer, submit himself to an examination by a physician or surgeon authorized to practise medicine under the laws of the state," etc. Pub. Laws 1911-12, chap. 831, art. 2, § 21, p. 436.

We do not find that this provision is important in determining the intent of our law, bearing in mind at all times that our law nowhere in terms excludes the consideration of injuries occurring out of the state, but in broad and general terms gives to the employee compensation for "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." Article 2. § 1. The provision for examination by the physician or surgeon is for the benefit and protection of the employer, and the act further provides: "If such employee refuses to submit himself for any examination provided for in this act, or in any way obstructs any such examination, his rights to compensation shall be suspended and his compensation during such period of suspension may be forfeited." Article 2, § 21.

The provisions here referred to are general, and apply to any time after the injury, during the pendency of proceedings, and during the operation of the decree, "during the continuance of his disability." It is not impossible for such examination to be made, at the request of the employer, even in another state; it will probably happen in most cases that a resident of this state, injured elsewhere, will come home for treatment and for the prosecution of his remedy under the law, and will be subject to examination here. At all events when the case arises it will be disposed of according to the act; and we do not propose further to discuss this provision until it shall be necessary, except to repeat that, in our opinion, it is not of importance in determining the general intent of the act. See Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, infra, where there is a similar provision in the law, but no inference of intent to confine the act to injuries arising in the state is drawn.

The next provisions of the Massachusetts act, referred to in Gould's Case, supra, relate to procedure, requiring that hearing "be held in the city or town where the injury occurred;" that papers shall be presented "to the superior court for the county in which the injury occurred," etc. These provisions, in our opinion, furnish the best ground in support of the decision in Gould's Case; there are no such provisions in the Rhode Island act, which provides (article 3, § 16, p. 444): "Sec. 16. Proceedings shall brought either in the county where the accident occurred or in the county where the employer or employee lives or has a usual place of business. The court where any proceeding is brought shall have power to grant a change of venue."

By the general provisions of the act original jurisdiction of these proceedings is vested in the superior court. From the provisions last quoted it will be seen that there is no difficulty about the jurisdiction, and it would almost seem that the general assembly, in making this provision, had taken pains to provide for jurisdiction in cases where the injury occurred out of the state. In our opinion no restriction of the scope of the act is to be found in this regard.

The provision regarding reports of injuries is found in Pub. Laws Jan. 1915, chap. 1268, pp. 261 et seq., and in some respects is similar to the provision of the Massachusetts act referred to in Gould's Case, supra. We do not regard it as of the slightest importance in determining the construction and scope of the act as a whole. The other provisions referred to in Gould's Case are not found in our act. We do not regard the decision in Gould's Case as a precedent which we should follow—partly because of the differences between the act there discussed and our act, as above shown; partly because we do not agree with certain reasoning therein set forth. We prefer the broader view set forth in certain cases hereafter cited from Connecticut, New Jersey, and New York.

The Workmen's Compensation Act of Connecticut (Laws 1913, chap. 138, of Public Acts; see also 2 Bradbury's Workmen's Compensation, p. 1144) in its general purpose, scope, and provisions, with minor differences in details, is very similar to the Rhode Island act. The same question here involved arose under the act and was decided in June, 1915, in the case of Kennerston v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A. 1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372. The case was a proceeding for compensation from the defendant, a Connecticut corporation, for the death of an employee, a citizen of Connecticut, who was in the employ of the defendant on a towboat, and whose death occurred by drowning in Raritan Bay, New Jersey, when the tug on which he was employed foundered. After disposing of certain contentions advanced by defendant that the petitioner's claim was cognizable only in the admiralty courts, or under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Act Congress April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, Comp. Stat. 1913, §§ 8657-8665), and some points of practice, the court in its opinion says (89 Conn. 374): "We come, then, to the next question: whether our Compensation Act provides for compensation for injuries received outside our state, and arising out of and in the course of the employment. The respondent insists that our act has no extraterritorial effect. That is not the precise question to be determined, but, rather, whether our act provides for compensation, arising out of a contract of employment authorized by our act, for injuries suffered without our jurisdiction. If our act authorizes such a contract, recovery may be had; otherwise not. Unless the intention to have a statute operate beyond the limits of a state is clearly expressed or reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act, or from its purpose, subject matter, or history, the presumption is that the statute is intended to have no extraterritorial effect. A like presumption should control the operation of a contract based upon a statutory authority. We find no clearly expressed intention in our act that the contract authorized should operate without the state. If found in the act, it must be found as an inference reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act, read in the light of its purpose, subject matter, and history. In our search for such an intention it is all important that we do not forget the remedial character of the act, and that we construe its provisions broadly and liberally 'in order to effectuate its purpose.' Powers v. Hotel Bond Co. 89 Conn. 143, 146, 93 Atl. 245. The remedy provided by our Compensation Act is substitutionary in character, furnishing what was purposed to be a more humanitarian and economical system as a substitute for one deemed wasteful to industrial enterprises and commerce, and unfair to employees. Its intent was to afford its protection to all Connecticut employers and employees who might voluntarily choose to make its provision for compensation for injury a part of their contracts of employment. It assumed that accident is incident to employment, and purposed to charge its cost, in the case of every injury not caused by the wilful and serious misconduct or intoxication of the injured employee, to the industry in which it occurred. It intended that the employee should know what compensation he or his dependents would receive in the event of injury, and that payment should be made speedily by a procedure at once simple and inexpensive. It intended that the employer should know his liability in this regard, and so might include it among the items charged to operation. If our act intends its contracts of employment to include compensation for injuries occurring only within our jurisdiction, it manifestly defeats its own ends. In that case the employer may not charge to the industry the compensation for injuries occurring without the state, and the employee, or his dependents may not collect the same. Neither employer nor employee can know what portion of this period of employment will be subject to the provisions of the act, and no provision for insurance of this liability will be practically possible, since it may not ordinarily be known what part of the service will be in and what part out of the state, or in what jurisdiction the service will be performed, in industries and commercial enterprises engaged in intrastate and interstate employment. The state boundary is not the limit of very many businesses. To subject them to the laws of the many jurisdictions in which they may be engaged will be especially burdensome to them, and involve them probably in greater expense and liability and far greater difficulties than under the old system. Equally hard will it prove to the employee, since he must pursue his remedy in the state of the accident, or the Federal court applying that state's law, and thus he may be brought under any one of many different Compensation Acts, with whose provisions he cannot hope to be familiar; some acts contractual in character, some compulsory, some optional, and some ex delicto; and he may find he has forfeited the benefit of the foreign act through failure to comply with its provisions. A reading of the several acts now in force convinces us that these difficulties are not imaginative, but imminent actualities. It is reasonable to infer that our legislature, inaugurating a new system, based upon humanitarian and economical considerations, should intentionally frustrate the object of the new system and cast a multitude of employers and employees into a maelstrom of trouble, uncertainty, and liability? On the other hand, is it not reasonable to infer that the legislature, having bottomed the right to compensation upon contract, deemed unimportant the place of injury, since it must be presumed to have known that contract and not the place of injury, would govern the recovery. Such a construction of the act would lift insuperable burdens from industry and commerce and workmen, and give to each his course and the ascertained fruits of the contract of his will. Whether the contract shall include injuries in a jurisdiction other than where the contract was made is determined by the expressions or implications of each act. Section 1, pt. A, of our act recites: 'In an action to recover damages for personal injury,' certain defenses shall not be available. Here is no limitation to injuries received within the state. We, through comity, enforce actions for injuries received outside the state when not against our law or public policy. The natural construction of this language makes it include every action wherever it originates. Section 1, pt. B, recites that, when employer and employee have accepted part B, the employer shall not be liable to any action for damages for personal injury sustained by his employee in the course of his employment, but the employer shall pay compensation on account of such injury as provided by the act. Do not the words 'any action' mean what they say? And have we any more right to insert after them 'within the state' than 'within or without the state?' In this section the acceptance of the act is, by its express terms, a renunciation and waiver of all rights and claims arising out of injuries sustained in the course of the employment, except as specified. It seems to us plain that the rights and claims waived are not merely those arising in Connecticut, but anywhere. In § 8, pt. B, compensation is required to be paid for 'any injury' which incapacitates for more than two weeks. There is no warrant for construing any injury to consist of one arising within the state. By § 20 every employer who has accepted part B 'shall keep a record of such injuries sustained by his employees in the course of their employment' and 'send each week to the commissioner such report of said injuries as the commission shall require.' It cannot be that the record intended was solely of the injuries happening within the state. Obviously it was intended to embrace all injuries occurring to such employees everywhere; any other construction would do violence to the ordinary meaning of the word used and to the manifest purpose in keeping the record. Similarly the notice of injury of § 21, and the voluntary agreement of § 22, relate to every injury, and not merely those occurring within the state. Under § 29, any employer may enter into a substitute system of compensation with his employees in lieu of the compensation of the act. The legislature had the undoubted power to make the substitute system apply to injuries without as well as those within the state. Is it likely that the legislature intended a substitute system applicable to employees when employed within the state and inapplicable when employed elsewhere? How could the employer engaged in intrastate and interstate employment take advantage of the substitute system? If the agreement of this character had to be confined to the injuries received in the state, neither employer nor employee would [undertake] it. Practically the provision for a substitute system would be . . . nugatory. Certain sections of the act are referred to as indicating that the act has relation exclusively to intrastate injuries. Thus, § 7, which requires the employer to furnish medical and surgical aid, and § 23, which requires the injured employee to submit himself to examination by a reputable physician, are said necessarily to refer to Connecticut practitioners. We see no practical reason why these sections may not refer to the practitioner without the state as well as within it. Unless this limitation be read in the section, the language used does not express the limitation."

The opinion then proceeds to discuss certain questions as to hearings before commissioners and courts, not contained in the Rhode Island act, which are not material here, and proceeds (89 Conn. 379): "In legislative acts inaugurating a new system not infrequently are found contradictory provisions, and it becomes the duty of the court to reconcile them so far as it can. L.R.A.1917B.

It does this, whenever it is possible, in such way as to sustain the act and carry out its purposes. This we believe to be our present duty. In a sense the injury may be said to have been sustained in the place of the contract, and, if appeal is taken, in cases of injury occurring without the state, to the county of the contract, the terms of the act will be reasonably satisfied. The precise question we are considering has been the subject of discussion in two cases,—one under the New Jersey act, a contractual optional act very similar to our own, where the trial court, in Deeny v. Wright & C. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. J. 121, construed the contract under the New Jersey act as we construe these contracts; the other under the Massachusetts act, where the supreme judicial court construed their act as confined to accidents within the state. Gould's Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 603, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60. We must accept the construction accorded the Massachusetts act by its supreme judicial court. It may be well, however, to point out that the court does not state that its act is contractual in character. That, as we have indicated, is of final importance in the conclusion we reach concerning our own act. Then, too, under the Massachusetts act, the employee is merely the beneficiary under a contract between the employer and the insured; with us the employer and employee enter into a contract relation. In its reference to and comment upon certain sections of their act, the court says that these must be found within the act from 'unequivocal language,' or 'plain and unmistakable words,' that the act was intended to relate to injuries without the commonwealth. We have adopted a broader rule. We read our act in the light of the purpose, subject matter, and history of the act, to determine whether it expressly or by reasonable inference intended to include in its contract injuries without our jurisdiction. This is our ordinary rule in the interpretation of statutes. The . . . court states that 'the subject of personal injuries received by a workman in the course of his employment is within the control of the sovereign power where the injury occurs.' And it argues that, if the act had intended employers and employees from different states to carry their domiciliary personal injury law with them into other jurisdictions, it would have expressed its intent in unambiguous words. This argument concerns a proceeding to enforce an ex delicto claim, not one for compensation by way of contract. It is also argued that, if an act is given extraterritorial force, similar effect must be given to like laws of other states. If contracts of employment cover compensation for injuries outside the state, recovery for these will be governed by the usual rules for the construction and enforcement of all contracts. We should give similar effect to contracts of like character to those before us, though made under a compensation act of another jurisdiction, provided they did not conflict with our law or public policy, and the machinery provided for the ascertainment and collection of the compensation could be used in our jurisdiction. Where, as with us, the determination of the award is committed to a board or commission under a specified procedure, there will be serious obstacles to the enforcement of the contract in a foreign jurisdiction. 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Compensation, 1914 ed. p. 52. If it should be necessary to so rule, no hardship would result; the parties in interest would be relegated to the place where they had elected to make their contract, and no questions of conflict of laws could arise. At the base of this question is the character of the compensation. Mr. Bradbury, repudiating his earlier view, stoutly maintains that, if the act be contractual, the contracts arising will, unless a contrary intent appears, be found to cover injuries without as well as within the state. We think his later conclusion sound, and one which will prove beneficial alike to employer and employee."

Also in June, 1915, the supreme court of New Jersey passed upon the question whether the act of that state applies, where the accident occurs in another state, in the case of Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392. In this case the petitioner was employed in New Jersey by the defendant, a New Jersey corporation, as a brakeman on a train which went into Pennsylvania, and was injured in Pennsylvania; his wages were paid in New Jersey; it was held that his contract of service was a New Jersey contract; both parties were subject to the New Jersey act. It was held that the act covered the case, and the petitioner could maintain his proceeding. The New Jersey act is, in its general features and scope, very similar to the Connecticut and Rhode Island acts; the provision requiring the employee to submit to medical examination in the state by a physician authorized to practise medicine in the state is almost the same in essential terms as in the Rhode Island, and differs slightly from the Connecticut, act. See Laws of N. J. 1911, chap. 95, § 17, p. 141. After disposing of certain preliminary questions, and deciding that the liability of the employer under the act was contractual, and discussing a certain previous decision not directly in point, the court said (87 N. J. L. 374): "We are now dealing with the simpler question, whether a New Jersey court will enforce a New Jersey contract according to the terms of a New Jersey statute. The question hardly calls for an answer. The place where the accident occurs is of no more relevance than is the place of accident to the assured in an action on a contract of accident insurance, or the place of death of the assured in an action on a contract of life insurance."

It is notable that these two cases should each have been independently decided by the courts of Connecticut and New Jersey in June, 1915, and have reached the same conclusion upon the same point in the consideration of statutes essentially similar. The latest case which has come to our attention is Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 10 N. C. C. A. 888 (January, 1916), a New York case, where the same question arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York. The case follows substantially the same line of argument and arrives at the same conclusion as the cases of Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, and Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. supra, both of which it cites with approval. See also Deeny v. Wright & C. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. J. 121; 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Compensation, pp. 50, 52 et seq., cited with approval in the Kennerson Case, supra, 89 Conn. 378, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, and in the Post Case, supra.

We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the cases above cited from New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut is quite applicable to the case at bar; that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Rhode Island the relation of employer and employee is contractual, and the terms of the act are to be read as a part of every contract of service between those subject to its terms; that, on principle and in reason, and in view of the purpose, scope, and character of the act, it should be construed and held to include injuries arising out of the state as well as those arising within it; and that the weight of authority upon acts similar to our own gives full support to our conclusion. Gould's Case, supra, stands alone so far as any cases have come to our attention, and is only deemed to be authoritative on the particular statute therein considered, which we regard as different from ours in many important respects.

The Superior Court was in error in dismissing the petition in this cause, for the reasons above set forth. The appeal is sustained, the decree of the Superior Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Superior Court for a trial upon its merits.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

C. S. FITZPATRICK, Admr., etc., of Henrietta Owens, Deceased, et al., Appts., v.

F. M. OWENS.

(124 Ark. 167, 186 S. W. 832, 187 S. W. 460.)

Husband and wife — liability of man for killing wife.

Where married women are, by statute, given the right to sue and be sued and to enjoy in law and equity all rights as though sole, a man wrongfully causing the death of his wife is liable in damages under a statute imposing liability in damages for wrongful death in case the person injured might have maintained an action had death not ensued.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, III, d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(Wood and Hart, JJ., dissent.)

(May 29, 1916.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Phillips County sustaining a demurrer to a complaint and dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiffs' intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bevens & Mundt and Hughes & Hughes, for appellants:

Where a married woman enjoys equal and separate legal identity of person, she has a right of action against her husband for a tort committed by him against her resulting in her injury.

Brown v. Brown, 88 Conn. 42, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, 89 Atl. 889, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 70; Fiedler v. Fiedler, 42 Okla. 124, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 189, 140 Pac. 1022.

Messrs. Moore, Vineyard, & Satterfield, Andrews & Burke, and Flink & Dinning, for appellee:

Neither spouse has the right to sue the other for personal torts.

Peters v. Peters, 156 Cal. 32, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 699, 103 Pac. 219; Bandfield v. Bandfield, 117 Mich. 80, 40 L.R.A. 757, 72 Am. St. Rep. 550, 75 N. W. 287; Abbott v.

Note. — The question as to the right of wife to sue husband for personal tort, which is apparently regarded in FITZPATRICK v. OWENS as determinative of the liability of a husband for wrongfully causing the death of a wife, is treated in the notes to Strom v. Strom, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 191; Thompson v. Thompson, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1153, and Brown v. Brown, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, and see later cases, Lillienkamp v. Rippetoe, L.R.A. 1916B, 881, and Gilman v. Gilman, L.R.A. 1916B, 907. L.R.A. 1917B.

Mathewson, 79 Conn. 23, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 611, 63 Atl. 285, 6 Ann. Cas. 1027.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to the allegations of the complaint, plaintiff's intestate, Henrietta Owens, was the wife of the defendant, F. M. Owens, and said parties had, by a decree of the chancery court of Phillips county, Arkansas, been divorced from bed and board, but not from the bonds of matrimony, that, while the said relation subsisted, the defendant made a felonious assault upon said Henrietta Owens and killed her, and that, by reason of said wrongful act of defendant, the estate of said decedent and her next of kin suffered injury which entitled them to recover damages in the large sum named in the complaint. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint and dismissed the action on the ground that a right of action on the part of either the administrator or next of kin was not set forth. In testing the sufficiency of the complaint, we must, of course, accept as true all the allegations set forth.

The action is based on the statute which provides as follows: "Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or company or corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony." Kirby's Dig. § 6289.

This court construed that statute, not as a continuation of the right of action which the deceased had in his lifetime, but as arising by the preservation of the cause of action which was in the deceased, and that, if the latter never had a cause of action, none accrues to his representative or next of kin. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 53 Ark. 117, 7 L.R.A. 283, 13 S. W. 801.

The question, then, for determination is the one stated by appellant in the brief, whether or not a married woman, under the statute now in force in Arkansas, may maintain against her husband an action to recover damages for tort committed by him. The cause of action, if any exists, arose since the enactment of a statute by the general assembly of 1915 entitled "An Act to Remove the Disabilities of Married Women in the State of Arkansas," and reads as follows: "Section 1. That from and after the passage of this act, every married woman and every woman who may in the future become married, shall have all the rights to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, and in law and equity shall enjoy all rights and be subjected to all the laws of this state, as though she were a feme sole." Acts 1915, p. 684.

It is difficult to find authority bearing upon the construction of this statute; for there are no statutes in other states in precisely the same language, or enacted under the same circumstances as this statute was passed. The disposition of all the courts in the construction of statutes relating to the rights of married women is to hold tenaciously to the rule that statutes in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed. This court has announced that rule in many cases, and has given it effect in confining within the narrowest possible limits statutes passed by the legislature to emancipate married women from their common-law disabilities. There are many cases cited on the brief construing statutes of this kind, and in most of the decisions the statutes were held not to give a married woman the right to maintain an action against her husband for tort. But, as before stated, none of the statutes are similar to ours, nor were they passed under the same circumstances. One of the leading cases on the subject is that of Thompson v. Thompson, 218 U. S. 611, 54 L. ed. 1180, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1153, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 21 Ann. Cas. 921, where the court decided that the statute of the District of Columbia declaring that married women "shall have power to engage in any business, and to contract, whether engaged in business or not, and to sue separately upon their contracts, and also to sue separately for the recovery, security or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried," did not confer upon the wife the right to sue her husband for damages on account of tort committed by him. In reaching that conclusion the court said that "it is apparent that its purposes, among others, were to enable a married woman to engage in business and to make contracts free from the intervention and control of the husband, and to maintain actions separately for the recovery, security, and protection of her property," and to sue separately for torts as freely as if she were not a married woman, but that the statute "was not intended to give a right of action as against the husband, but to allow the wife, in her own name, to maintain actions of tort which at common law must be brought in the joint names of herself and husband." The case was decided by a divided court; there being a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan, in which Justices Holmes and Hughes concurred. The statute then under consideration was not as strong in the enlargement of the rights of married women as the one passed in this state, but the opinion of the court undoubtedly shows the tendency of the court, at least at that time, to restrict as far as possible those statutes, and to only follow the legislative will as expressed in the most irresistible language in enlarging the rights of married women.

There are statutes in many states enlarging the rights of married women to contract and to maintain suits both upon contract and for tort the same as that given by law to the husband, and those statutes have uniformly been construed to give no greater rights than the husband had, and therefore the right to maintain an action for tort was not conferred, for the reason that the husband had no such right. Strom v. Strom, 98 Minn. 427, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 191, 116 Am. St. Rep. 387, 107 N. W. 1047; Schultz v. Christopher, 65 Wash. 496, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 780, 118 Pac. 629; Drum v. Drum, 60 N. J. L. 557, 55 Atl. 86; Rogers v. Rogers, 265 Mo. 200, 177 S. W. 382.

In other states where there are statutes authorizing the wife to contract, either with her husband or with others, and providing that she may sue or be sued alone, the courts have construed those statutes to refer solely to contractual rights, and to provide a remedy merely for the enforcement of those rights. Peters v. Peters, 156 Cal. 32, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609, 103 Pac. 219; Main v. Main, 46 Ill. App. 106; Bandfield v. Bandfield, 117 Mich. 80, 40 L.R.A. 758, 72 Am. St. Rep. 550, 75 N. W. 287.

In still other states statutes somewhat similar are held merely to give the right to sue upon causes of action which existed at common law, and not to otherwise enlarge the common-law rights of a married woman.

an. Peters v. Peters, 42 Iowa, 182; Abbott v. Abbott, 67 Me. 304, 24 Am. Rep. 27; Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641.

Counsel for appellee rely, with much apparent confidence, on the decision of the supreme court of Tennessee in the case of Lillienkamp v. Rippetoe, 133 Tenn. 57, L.R.A.1916B, 881, 179 S. W. 628, but we think that decision has little, if any, bearing on the construction of the statute now before us. In that case the court construed a recent enactment of the Tennessee legislature declaring that married women "are hereby fully emancipated from all disability on account of coverture, and the common law as to the disabilities of married women and its effects on the rights of property of the wife is totally abrogated, and marriage shall not impose any disability or incapacity on a woman as to the ownership, acquisition, or disposition of property of any sort, or as to her capacity to make contracts and do all acts in reference to property which she could lawfully do if she were not married," and that "every woman now married, or hereafter to be married, shall have the same capacity to acquire, hold, manage, control, use, enjoy, and dispose of all property, real and personal, in possession, and to make any contract in reference to it, and to bind herself personally, and to sue and be sued with all the rights and incidents thereof, as if she were not married," and the court decided that the statute did not confer the right on the wife to sue the husband for tort. In disposing of the matter the court said: "We must assume that the legislature had in mind in the passage of the act the fundamental doctrine of the unity of husband and wife under the common law, and the correlative duties of husband and wife to each other, and to the well-being of the social order growing out of the marriage relation, and that, if it had been the purpose of the legislature to alter these further than as indicated in the act, that purpose would have been clearly expressed, or would have appeared by necessary implication."

All the statutes of this character do, as stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Thompson v. Thompson, supra, "treat the wife as a feme sole, and to a large extent alter the common-law theory of the unity of husband and wife." The difficulty is that the courts, in their reluctance to change the common-law rules of law and procedure, place too narrow restrictions upon the manifest designs of the law-makers. There are two decisions brought to our attention which hold broadly, under statutes not near so strong as ours in the emancipation of married women from all common law disabilities, that the wife can sue the husband on account of torts committed by him. Brown v. Brown, 88 Conn. 42, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 185, 89 Atl. 889, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 70; Fiedler v. Fiedler, 42 Okla. 124, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 189, 140 Pac. 1022. The Connecticut statute construed in the case above cited merely declared that "all property hereafter acquired by any married woman shall be held by her to her sole and separate use," and that court held that, giving that statute full scope, each party to the marriage retains his or her legal identity and capacity to own property, and each may sue or be sued at law, not only for breach of contract, but may sue each other for a tort. In stating the conclusions of the court it was said: "It is true that courts in some of the states have held that statutes more or less similar to the one here in question give a married woman no right of action against her husband for a tort. They find in the statutes construed no legislative intent to change the legal status of husband and wife as regards the legal identity of the two, but simply an intent to ameliorate the condition of the wife by permitting her to retain and deal with her own property, and to contract with, and sue and be sued, by, others than her husband. These courts generally hold that, unless there is an express provision giving her the right to sue her husband, she has no action against him upon contract or for tort. . . . If the legislative intent in such an enactment is not to change the foundation upon which the status of married persons was based at common law, namely, their legal identity, but its purpose is to empower the wife, while that status exists, to contract and sue in her own name like a feme sole, it might well be held that language bestowing this right could not be so extended as to permit her to contract with her husband or to sue him for a tort, because the statute intends that her identity shall still be merged in that of her husband."

The court then proceeds further to hold that the effect of the statute of that state with respect to the rights of married people was that "the parties retain their legal identity, and their several rights are to be determined in accordance with the status thus established," and that, the wife's separate identity not being lost by her coverture, it necessarily resulted, from the "retention of her legal identity after coverture that she has a right of action against her husband for a tort committed by him against her and resulting in her injury."

In the Oklahoma case referred to the court held that the general statutes there declaring that a woman shall "retain the same legal existence and legal personality after marriage as before marriage, and shall receive the same protection of all her rights as a woman, which her husband does as a man," gave her the right to sue him for tort.

It is unnecessary for us, in order to sustain the right of action of the plaintiffs in the present case, to go as far as did the Oklahoma case, because that case is in conflict with the decisions in those states which hold that a statute merely enlarging the rights of married women to those of the husband do not give her the right to sue for torts. Our statute must be construed in the light of previous legislation in this state, which had already gone very far towards complete emancipation of a married woman from all the common-law disabilities of coverture. Those statutes provided that married women could own property of any kind, and hold the same in their own right, and convey it as a feme sole; that she could enter into contracts with reference to her separate property, and sue and be sued with reference thereto. The Act of 1873 (Acts 1873, p. 384, § 9) provided that "any married woman may bring and maintain an action in her own name for or on account of her sole and separate estate or property, or for damages against any person or body corporate, for any injury to her person, character or property, the same as if she were sole."

Another statute conferred upon a married woman the power to enter into executory contracts for the sale of her lands (Act March 19, 1895; Kirby's Dig. § 5209). Sparks v. Moore, 66 Ark. 537, 56 S. W. 1064. After this court had decided in Kies v. Young, 64 Ark. 381, 62 Am. St. Rep. 198, 42 S. W. 669, that the husband was liable for the antenuptial obligations of his wife, the legislature changed that rule, thus indicating the further desire to preserve the separate identity of the wife. Act Feb. 1, 1899; Kirby's Dig. § 5223. These enactments left but little in the way of restrictions upon the rights of married women, but the legislature deemed it proper to provide further legislation to completely emancipate her, and they did so by this statute which declares its purpose in the broadest terms to "remove the disabilities of married women." An analysis of the language of the statute shows that the legislature meant to complete the work of emancipation and to give married women all the rights and remedies possessed by unmarried women. The words "to sue and be sued," when considered by themselves, merely enlarge the remedies of a married woman, and do not enlarge her rights, but in considering the significance of those words we must do so in connection with the words which precede and which follow, and undoubtedly the use of those words serves to give a remedy for all the rights found to have been enlarged by the preceding words and those which follow. Now, the preceding words confer, in unqualified terms, the right of the married woman "to contract and be contracted with," and the words which follow declare in the very broadest terms her right "in law and equity" to "enjoy all rights and be subjected to all the laws of the state as though she were a feme sole." If this language be given any effect at all in the light of preceding statutes enlarging the rights of the married woman, it necessarily means that a married woman is to enjoy in law and equity all the rights which she would enjoy if she still remained a single woman, and that with respect to those rights she may sue and be sued.

The inquiry arises whether the language of the statute giving her only such rights and remedies as she would enjoy if she were a feme sole necessarily excludes the right to maintain a suit against her husband for the reason that, if she were a feme sole, she would have no husband to sue, and therefore it is not intended to give her any greater right than she would have if she were a feme sole. We scarcely think that the lawmakers had that in mind; for they were dealing entirely with enlarged rights and remedies of a married woman, and it was evidently meant to confer upon her the enjoyment of those rights and remedies, even against her husband, the same as if she were unmarried.

We are convinced, therefore, that this was the intention of the lawmakers, and it would be doing violence to their manifest purpose to further apply the rule of restriction on account of the statute being in derogation of the common law, and to hold that a married woman has no right of action against her husband. We have, as has been so often said by this and other courts, nothing to do with the policy of the law; for that is controlled entirely by the legislative branch of government. It cannot be said that there is any such fixed policy on the subject that the legislature has not the power to change. As to the policy of such a statute the Connecticut court, in the case referred to, said: "The danger that the domestic tranquillity may be disturbed if husband and wife have rights of action against each other for torts, and that the courts will be filled with actions brought by them against each other for assault, slander, and libel, as suggested in some of the cases cited in behalf of the defendant, we think is not serious. So long as there remains to the parties domestic tranquillity, while a remnant is left of that affection and respect without which there cannot have been a true marriage, such actions will be impossible. When the purposes of the marriage relation have wholly failed by reason of the misconduct of one or both of the parties, there is no reason why the husband or wife should not have the same remedies for injuries inflicted by the other spouse which the courts would give them against other persons. Courts are established and maintained to enforce remedies for every wrong, upon the theory that it is for the public interest that personal differences should thus be adjusted rather than that the parties should be left to settle them according to the law of nature. No greater public inconvenience and scandal can thus arise than would arise if they were left to answer one assault with another and one slander with another slander, until the public peace is broken and the criminal law invoked against them."

Again it is said against this construction of the statute that it confers a greater right upon the wife than it does upon the husband. That may be true, and still the statute is in accord with previous legislation on the subject which gives the wife greater rights than the husband. It was within the power of the legislature to give the wife new rights without conferring reciprocal rights upon the husband, and that view of it does not militate against the validity of the statute, nor does it prevent that construction being placed upon it.

Upon the whole, we are convinced from the language of this statute and the fact that it was enacted to add something more to the whole sum of the law on that subject that the statute meant to give the wife the right to maintain an action against her husband, either upon contract or for tort.

The conclusion of the Circuit Court was therefore erroneous, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Hart J., dissenting (July 10, 1916):

I do not think the construction placed upon the act under consideration is justified by its language, and it seems to me that the construction is opposed to the trend of our former decision relating to the question. In the case of Kies v. Young, 64 Ark. 381, 62 Am. St. Rep. 198, 42 S. W. 669, the court expressly recognizes the rule in the construction of married women acts to be that, where the legislature does not, by express words or by clear implication, express an intention to repeal the existing law in regard to married women, the presumption is that they intended the rule should remain.

The court said that the common-law unity of husband and wife still exists in this state L.R.A.1917B.

except so far as the legislative purpose to change it has been expressed by statute. The statute under consideration is as follows: "Section 1. That, from and after the passage of this act, every married woman, and every woman who may in the future become married, shall have all the rights to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, and in law and equity shall enjoy all rights and be subjected to all the laws of this state, as though she were a feme sole." Acts 1915, p. 684.

Reliance seems to be placed in the decision of the majority in the dissenting opinion of Judge Harlan in Thompson v. Thompson, 218 U. S. 611, 54 L. ed. 1180, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1153, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 21 Ann. Cas. 921. A statute governing the District of Columbia was under consideration in that case, and it specially provided that married women might sue for torts committed against them as fully and freely as if they were unmarried; and Judge Harlan's dissent was based upon this special provision of the statute. I think that an examination of his dissenting opinion will lead to the conclusion that, had it not been for this special provision, he would not have dissented from the majority opinion.

The first part of our act, providing that married women shall have all rights to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, I think gives her the right to make contracts with her husband, as well as with third persons, and to sue or be sued by him, as well as others, in regard to such contracts. Before the passage of the act, by the common law, a husband and wife were deemed to be one person, and no suit at law of any character could be maintained by one against the other in this state. Suits between a husband and wife, however, have long been permitted in equity.

It seems to me that the object of the statute was the placing of the husband and wife upon an equal footing in regard to the making of contracts and ascertaining their rights thereunder. Under the common law, the husband did not have the right to sue the wife for a tort. I do not think the language of the present statute indicates a legislative intent, "to make a departure from the common law so radical and so opposed to its general policy, as the authorization of a suit by the husband or wife against the other for injuries to the person or character." See Peters v. Peters, 156 Cal. 32, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 699, 103 Pac. 219. In the case of Jackson v. Williams, 92 Ark. 486, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 840, 123 S. W. 751, it was held that a husband was liable for a tort of the wife not committed in his presence, and the ruling was based upon the unity of person in husband and wife. But it is said that no force can be given to the latter part of the section, unless the construction placed upon the act by the majority opinion is adopted. It can be said, with equal force, that all the language preceding that is useless, if the opinion of the majority is adopted; because if the language of the latter part of the section is broad enough to include suits by the wife against the husband for personal torts, it is certainly broad enough to include suits by her against him on contracts, and it was entirely useless to have embodied the language used in the first part of the section in the statute. It is our duty to give force and effect to every part of the statute, if we can do so without doing violence to its language. I think the first part of the section gives the wife the right to contract and be contracted with by her husband and that the words "sue and be sued" have relation to such contracts, and that the latter part of the section, which provides that "in law and equity shall enjoy all the rights and be subject to the laws of this state as though a feme sole," was intended to remove the rigor of our former rule in regard to making the husband liable for torts of his wife not committed in his presence, and other matters of that kind. I believe, however, it was the intention of the lawmakers to still preserve the legal unity of husband and wife, and that marriage still "acts as a perpetually operating discharge of all wrongs between man and wife, committed by one upon the other." In other words, if the legislature had intended such a radical departure from the rule as it now exists as indicated by the majority opinion. It would have said so in plain terms. Many cases might be cited to show that statutes broader than ours have not conferred upon husband and wife the right to sue each other for personal tort.

But my dissent is based upon what I believe to be an adherence to the principles of law heretofore decided by this court. I have no regret that, by judicial construction, the rules of the common law on this subject "have gone to that bourne from which no traveler returns, where they must rest undistinguished by a single tear shed for their departure."

Wood, J., concurs in this dissent.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF DAYTON, Appt.,
v.
TRUSTEES OF SPEERS HOSPITAL.

(165 Ky. 56, 176 S. W. 361.)

Tax — hospital — exacting pay for services — effect.

That a charge is made for services rendered by a hospital to help defray its expenses does not render it taxable if it was founded by funds donated for that purpose, and is operated as a public charity.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Campbell County dismissing its petition filed to procure a sale of the hospital of which defendants were trustees, in satisfaction of taxes assessed against it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Hubbard Schwartz for appellant.

Messrs. Kelly & Regenstein for appellees.

Note. — On the question of requiring payment from inmates as affecting right of charitable institution to public aid or exemption from taxation, see annotation following this case, post, 782.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal of the city of Dayton, Kentucky, from a judgment rendered by the Campbell circuit court, in an action by the city against J. O. Jenkins, John L. Phythian, and W. E. Senour, trustees of the Speers Hospital, in which the city sought to procure a decree of sale of the hospital in satisfaction of taxes assessed against it by the officials of the city for the years 1910 and 1911. The defense offered by the appellees was that the hospital was an institution of purely public charity, and the case resulted in a judgment dismissing the petition of appellant. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which are, in substance, that the taxes for the benefit of the city were regularly levied upon the hospital for the years mentioned, in the first of which years the taxable value of which it was assessed was $28,000, and the second year $38,000, and the whole amount sought to be recovered was $1,100.50, as taxes due from it to the city for the years mentioned. The hospital was founded by funds set apart for that purpose by the will of Elizabeth L. Speers, who died in 1894, and whose will was duly probated October 20, 1894. The item of the will which set apart the funds for the erection and maintenance of the hospital, after providing that the various specific legacies devised in the will to various persons should be paid, and all costs and expenses incident to the settlement of her estate "conveyed and transferred the entire balance of her estate, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind, wherever situated, to Dr. B. K. Rachford, Dr. C. B. Schoolfield, and William C. Pickering, as trustees, in trust, for the establishment and maintenance of a hospital in the city of Dayton, Campbell county, Kentucky. Said hospital to be erected and maintained, and conducted in such a manner, and upon such plan as, in their judgment, would do the greatest good. Said trustees shall annually report all of their acts and doings to the highest court in said county, having original equitable jurisdiction, and all vacancies in said trustees shall be filled by said court. Said court shall require from said trustees proper bonds, for the performance of their duties, and it may allow them annually, out of the trust funds, a just and fair compensation for their labor, etc."

In pursuance to the trust thus created, the trustees and their successors erected the hospital at a cost of about $72,000, which left real estate of the value of $14,200 situated in Ohio, which also passed into the hands of the trustees. The receipts of the hospital, with the rents of the property in Cincinnati, were not sufficient to pay its operating expenses, and its doors were closed, but in 1901 the present trustees were appointed, and they applied to the Campbell circuit court for permission to borrow $6,000 to pay its debts, and $2,000 additional with which to make needed repairs. The trustees borrowed the $8,000 from J. J. Ellerhorst, and thereafter they borrowed from Ellerhorst $2,250 additional, making $10,250, to secure which they gave a mortgage for that sum upon the real estate situated in Cincinnati, Ohio; and, while the income from that property did not quite pay the interest on the Ellerhorst mortgage, he accepted same in full satisfaction of it. In 1909 it became necessary to provide a more commodious and convenient building for the nurses at the hospital, and the trustees again applied to the Campbell circuit court and received permission to borrow $20,000 for that purpose, and to secure it by a mortgage upon the hospital itself. $16,453.36 of this fund was expended in erecting the necessary additional building, and the remaining $3,546.64 was put in the treasury of the hospital, and used to pay accumulated debts and the operating expenses of the institution. There was another debt of $1,000 due one Langendorfer, incurred in building the nurses' addition to the hospital, and Langendorfer had secured his claim by filing a mechanic's lien upon the hospital property, and to satisfy this claim the circuit court authorized the trustees to place another mortgage upon the property for that sum, which was done in 1912. The average number of patients cared for in the hospital each day in 1910 was thirty-three, of which number nineteen were private patients and fourteen public patients, and the average number of patients cared for in 1911 each day was twenty-seven, of which number fourteen were private patients and thirteen were public patients. In the year 1910 the city of Dayton sent to the hospital and paid for twenty patients, who remained there an aggregate of three hundred fifty-eight days, and in 1911 it sent twenty-one patients to the hospital, who remained an aggregate of four hundred thirty-two days. Private patients are those who enter the hospital and pay from their own resources for their room, board and nursing and pay the physician for professional services rendered them directly. The profit, if any, derived from the care of these private patients, for their rooms, board and nursing, goes into the general fund of the hospital, and is used for maintaining the hospital. Public patients are described as those who come of their own accord, or are sent by the authorities of the cities of Dayton, Bellevue, and Newport, and Campbell county. All public patients are received and treated in the public wards. No patients are kept in the hospital without charge, but some patients who come of their own accord fail to pay their bills. All public patients receive medical attention at the hands of the members of the hospital staff free of charge to them, and one interne is on duty at all times, and his services are also given to the patients. The hospital trustees serve, and have always served, without compensation. When the hospital first began operation, a number of rooms were furnished by charitably inclined persons and organizations, and since that time other rooms have been furnished in a similar manner. The hospital each year receives from various sources charitable contributions in the way of beds, towels, furniture, food supplies, and various necessities, which have been used for the benefit of all the patients in the operation of the hospital. The hospital is located in the central part of Dayton, and has the benefit of the sewerage system of the city of Dayton, and such police and fire protection as is furnished any other building in the city. The hospital pays the same for water, gas, and electric light and power service as is paid by other consumers. Each year during its operation the hospital has received contributions of money, which are used in the operation of the hospital.

The agreed statement of facts further shows that for several years before the year 1910 the cities of Dayton and Bellevue contributed annually to the hospital the sum of $1,000, and the city of Newport contributed annually to the support of the hospital $3,000, and the county of Campbell contributed annually the sum of $1,000. These contributions were made to the hospital upon condition that the indigent sick of the three cities named and of the county were to be received at the hospital and treated there without charge to them. This plan continued for several years, when it was changed, so that the cities of Dayton, Bellevue, and Newport paid $1.05 per day for each indigent person sent to the institution by them; but in the year 1913 the city of Newport paid $3,500 for that year, while the county of Campbell continued to donate $1,000 per year, as theretofore. The hospital trustees have given to the cities of Dayton and Bellevue notice that after March 1, 1914, the rate to be paid for each patient per day was to be $1.20. The actual cost per day for caring for each patient has been $1.28 per day. During the year 1910, in addition to the public patients received from the three cities named and Campbell county, three persons came of their own accord, who remained an aggregate of twenty days, and in 1911 three such patients were treated for an aggregate of thirty-three days.

It was also agreed that the earnings of the hospital for the year ending August 31, 1909, for board, operating, nursing, rents, donations, miscellaneous receipts of all kinds, and discounts earned, amounted to $18,720.69, while its expenses for the same time for wages, provisions, fuel, water, light, surgical supplies, drugs, house supplies, repairs, interest, insurance, and general expenses amounted to $17,032.89, which, after deducting $861.45 for persons treated free of charge, left a balance in favor of the institution of $826.35. For the year ending August 31, 1910, the receipts of the hospital amounted to $18,067.03, and deducting the expenses for the same period from it left a net deficit for the same year of $147.87, and deducting the expenses from the earnings for the year ending August 31, 1911, showed a net gain for the year of $184.14. A statement of the earnings and expenses for the year ending August 31, 1912, showed a net balance in favor of the institution of $126.43.

This court, in Kentucky Female Orphans' School v. Louisville, 100 Ky. 470, 40 L.R.A. 119, 36 S. W. 921, and in Widows' & Orphans' Home v. Com. 126 Ky. 386, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 829, 103 S. W. 354, quoted with approval from the case of Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565, 25 Atl. 55, wherein it laid down, among others, the two following rules by which to determine whether an institution was one of purely public charity:

"First. Whatever is done or given gratuitously in relief of the public burdens or for the advancement of public good is a public charity. Where the public is the beneficiary, the charity is public, and where no private or pecuniary return is reserved to the giver or to any particular person, but all the benefits resulting from the gift or act go to the public, is a purely public charity: the word 'purely' being equivalent to 'wholly.'"

"Third. An institution founded and endowed as a purely public charity does not lose its character as such, under the tax laws, if it receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty sufficient to keep it in operation."

In the case of Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, the Ohio supreme court said: "When the charity is public, the exclusion of all idea of private gain or profit is equivalent, in effect, to the force of 'purely,' as applied to public charity in the Constitution."

And the test of purely public charity is the object for which it was founded. If it was for the general public good, and not for private gain, and was so conducted that the public received all the benefits of it, it is a purely public charity. Donohugh v. Library Co. 86 Pa. 306.

By the will of Elizabeth Speers, the funds for the establishment and maintenance of this hospital in the city of Dayton were set apart by her, and the hospital to be erected and maintained was to be conducted in such a manner and upon such a plan as, in the judgment of the trustees, would do the greatest good. No provision is in the will providing that the funds so set apart should ever revert to any private person, or should in any event ever be used for any purpose, except the one designated in the will. The title to the property is vested in trustees who have no personal interest in the property whatever, and in the case of vacancies in the office of trustees the vacancies must be filled by the circuit court of the county. The purpose of the donor was to create a pure charity, and the fund was placed in the service of the public without any view to provide gain for any one. The nursing and medical treatment of the indigent sick, and of those whose pecuniary circumstances are such as will not justify an expenditure of more than a small sum for medical and surgical treatment, and nursing and caring while sick, is, without question, a public charity; if the doors of the institution are open to all persons alike. It is always the duty of the state to provide for its indigent sick.

It does not appear that it was ever intended that any private gain should result to any person in the operation of the trust created by the donor in setting apart the fund for the erection and maintenance of the hospital. The supervision of its operation was given to the court of the highest equitable jurisdiction in the county, and the power to name the trustees was vested in the same tribunal; thus stamping it with evidences of its public character. In its operation no one has been excluded from its benefits. The county in which it is situated and the near-by cities have used it as an instrumentality to care for their indigent sick, and to procure surgical and medical treatment for them. It is true the county and cities have compensated the institution for the care and treatment of their poor and friendless sick, but in a sum less than the actual cost to the institution for caring for them. One half of the inmates have received the services of the physicians, as well as the nursing and their board, free of any charge to them. While a charge is made against every patient other than the ones who are consigned there by the county or cities, it does not appear that any one has ever been turned away or excluded from its benefits because of poverty or inability to pay for the benefits. Private patients are received, who pay the institution for their rooms, boarding, and nursing, and pay their physicians for their treatment, but the funds received from this source are all devoted to the general expenses of the hospital. A building and grounds and furniture are not adequate to maintain a hospital. The nurses must be paid, fuel and lights, water and food, provided, and some one to superintend and direct the operations of the hospital. The fact that the institution receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty sufficient to keep it in operation does not take from it its character as a purely public charity, where it was found and endowed as such, and when all of the receipts go to providing for the purposes for which it was erected and maintained. The municipalities and the county itself in which the institution is located, and whose duty it is to care for the indigent sick of each of them, respectively, have, by its use, been saved the burden of erecting an institution of the kind of their own, or otherwise caring for such sick.

In 6 Cyc. 900, a public charity is defined: To be "a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government."

The Speers Hospital has been so conducted and was so endowed and maintained that no private gain has come to anyone, and all of its benefits go to the public.

The cases of Wathen v. Louisville, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 635, 85 S. W. 1195, and Gray Street Infirmary v. Louisville, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1274, 55 L.R.A. 270, 65 S. W. 11, relied upon to show that Speers Hospital is not a purely public charity, are not in point; since each of those institutions was founded and conducted with a view to private gain and resulted in private gain to the managers.

It is therefore adjudged that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

As to effect of derivation of income from public property upon its right to exemption from taxation, see note to Com. v. Richmond, L.R.A.1915A, 1118.

Practically all of the cases in the earlier note as well as those since decided hold that charitable institutions do not lose their right to public aid or L.R.A.1917B.

exemption from taxation by requiring inmates to pay for the privileges or care received by them therein.

Thus, in DAYTON v. SPEERS HOSPITAL, ante, 779, it was held that the fact that a hospital received a revenue from the recipients of its bounty, sufficient to keep it in operation, did not take from it its character as a purely public charity, which made it exempt from taxation, where it was founded and endowed as such, and all of the receipts were used for the purposes for which it was erected and maintained.

In Denville Twp. v. St. Francis Sanatorium (1916) — N. J. —, 98 Atl. 254, a sanatorium was held exempt from taxation under a statutory exemption of all buildings used for charitable, benevolent, or religious purposes, not conducted for profit, although it was partly supported by fees and charges received from beneficiaries, where the entire income therefrom was used for charitable, benevolent, or religious purposes.

A Young Men's Christian Association is not deprived of its statutory exemption from taxation by the requirement of small annual fees from members. Little v. Newburyport (1912) 210 Mass. 414, 96 N. E. 1032, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 425.

The portion of a Young Men's Christian Association building used for dormitories for its members, for the use of which a fee is charged from which a revenue is acquired which is used in the work of the association, is not subject to taxation under a constitutional provision exempting from taxation real estate belonging to, and actually and exclusively occupied and used by, such association, although another section provides that whenever a building or any part thereof shall be leased or shall be a source of revenue or profit, it shall be liable to taxation, since the dormitories are not leased, and their purpose is not for revenue, but to assist in the purposes of the association. Com. v. Lynchburg Y. M. C. A. (1914) 115 Va. 745, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1197, 80 S. E. 589.

Generally, as to exemption from property taxation of property of Young Men's Christian Association, see note to Y. M. C. A. v. Parish, L.R.A. 1916D, 275.

A religious order does not lose its right to exemption from taxation as a charitable institution by the boarding of pupils attending a school conducted by it. Re Ottawa (1913) 29 Ont. L. Rep. 568, 15 D. L. R. 725.

The letting of rooms to persons other than the students of a seminary of learning, in one of the buildings belonging to and used by it for its ordinary purposes, where the whole of the income so derived is used for the purpose of the seminary, does not deprive it of its exemption from taxation under a statute exempting buildings actually used as a L.R.A. 1917B.

seminary of learning, maintained for philanthropic, religious, or educational purposes, the whole profits from which are devoted to such purposes only. Re Sisters of Congregation of Notre Dame, (1912) — Ont. —, 1 D. L. R. 329.

In Maxcy v. Oshkosh (1910) 144 Wis. 238, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787, 128 N. W. 899, 1136, it was held that the fact that a will creating a public charitable trust in the form of a manual training school required the exaction of a tuition fee which, in the judgment of the municipal donee, should be sufficient, together with the income of the trust fund, to properly maintain the school, did not preclude the city from contributing the money of its taxpayers towards the support of the school.

But in Huntington v. Swedish Baptist Home (1916) 90 Conn. 504, 97 Atl. 860, it was held that a home for temporary rest and recreation of overworked persons, and for permanent accommodation of old and infirm members of a denomination, supported by donations and by the payments of inmates, was not entitled to exemption from taxation under a statute exempting buildings used exclusively as infirmaries, or for benevolent or ecclesiastical purposes.

There are many cases other than those involving the right to public aid or exemption from taxation holding that the charitable character of an institution is not destroyed by the fact that payment is required from inmates. Many of these cases are cited in notes dealing with the liability of a charitable institution for personal injuries, which may be found in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481; 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74; 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 486; 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62; 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1144; and 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505.

Other cases where the ultimate question was as to the validity of a charitable bequest may be found in the note to Buchanan v. Kennard, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 993. G. V. L.

Holland v. Brown, 140 N. Y. 349, 35 N. E. 577.

Hogan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Lot No. 33 in the township of Hannibal, Oswego county, as distinguished on a map of the military township, contained 600 acres. Lying in the westerly side of said lot No. 33, and extending a short distance westerly outside the west line of said lot, is a small body of water, oval in shape, without inlet or outlet, about two thirds of a mile in length and half as broad. About five sixths of the water is upon lot No. 33. In 1850, one Loomis, a surveyor, made a map of lot No. 33 and filed the same in Oswego county clerk's office. The numbers of the subdivisions appearing on an earlier map were changed upon the Loomis map, and conveyances after 1850 were made with reference to the Loomis map. The water of the "Spring or Mud lake," so called, is described as pure, and quantities of moss and ice are annually taken from the same for commercial purposes.

The plaintiff, by deed dated December 28, 1906, obtained title to 94 acres of land in lot No. 33, bounded on the north by lands of Vorce and Barnes and the north line of lot No. 33, on the east by the highway, on the south by the land of Baker, now claimed by defendant, and on the west by the west line of great lot No. 33, according to the map made by Loomis. The land thus conveyed covered the land surrounding the northerly end of the lake in lot No. 33 and about three quarters the length of the lake on the easterly side thereof. A small portion of the lake, at the southerly end, extended into the lot south of plaintiff's land claimed by defendant, the northerly line of said lot running east about 25 chains from the shore of the lake to the highway. This action was in trespass by reason, as alleged by plaintiff, of an unlawful entry by defendant upon the lake in question and cutting and removal of ice from that portion of the lake directly west of plaintiff's land and north of the boundary of the land claimed by defendant. The trial justice submitted the case to the jury, and instructed them that plaintiff owned the land east of the center of the lake and north of his south line extended, and if the jury found that defendant cut any ice in that portion of the lake, he was a trespasser. The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff. The trial justice held that plaintiff could not, under the proofs offered, establish title to all lands under water to the westerly side of lot No. 33, but had established title to the thread of the stream. Defendant claimed the right to establish an interest in the lake and the land under water to the geographical center of the body of water, and asserted that each owner on the lake was entitled to a triangular parcel of land under water, with its apex at such center and the base on the shore line of his property by reason of the oval shape of the lake. Evidence was adduced by defendant to locate such geographical center. The trial justice held that each abutting owner was entitled to the land under water to a line drawn through the longest diameter of the lake, and in that conclusion, affirmed by the appellate division, we concur. Though the body of water in question is oval in shape, an examination of the Loomis map discloses the shore line to be quite regular. By extending the boundary lines of the land of the plaintiff on the south side into the lake to the thread of the stream, and then following northerly the thread of the stream to the head of the lake would result in an allotment to plaintiff of only such portion of the lake as the shore line of his premises discloses would be fair and proportionate. While the divisions by a geographical center, as asserted by defendant, would give to him an unfair proportion of the lake, to the detriment of plaintiff and other riparian owners.

In this state and in most of other jurisdictions where the common-law rule obtains, the rule has been established that, as between adjoining owners on non-navigable streams and rivers, each owner takes title ad medium filium aquæ, in proportion to his line on the margin in front of his upland according to straight lines drawn at right angles between the side lines of his land on the shore and the center line of the stream. The decisions of our courts relating to the ownership of land under water in inland lakes are founded upon the principles of law applicable to rivers. Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393; Gouverneur v. National Ice Co. 134 N. Y. 355, 16 L.R.A. 695, 30 Am. St. Rep. 669, 31 N. E. 865; Ledyard v. Ten Eyck, 36 Barb. 102; Deuterman v. Gainsborg, 9 App. Div. 151, 41 N. Y. Supp. 185. As pointed out in the very illuminating opinion written by the trial justice in this case (64 Misc. 149, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1049), the question has arisen in some jurisdictions when the body of water was so irregular that a division of rights therein upon the rule prevailing in this state would seem inequitable; but the facts in this case are clearly distinguishable from the decisions made where such difficult situations were involved. In this state may be found many inland lakes of varying size and shape. It would be well-nigh impossible to lay down a general rule applicable alike to all of them, as each case depends upon its own peculiar circumstances and facts. The case at bar is not out of the ordinary. The body of water under consideration is legally a non-navigable stream, its length is double the width of the same, the shore line practically unbroken by coves or bays, the lot lines bounding the same at right angles with the stream. A line drawn through the center of the stream north and south equitably and proportionately gives to each riparian owner an interest to that line in the water or the land thereunder without undue advantage over his neighbor. Should the present shore line at some future date be extended uniformly into the lake by alluvion, even midway to the thread of the stream, as it is located at the present time, the allotment made by the trial justice in this case would be justified. People ex rel. Cornwell v. Woodruff, 30 App. Div. 43, 51 N. Y. Supp. 515, affirmed on opinion below, 157 N. Y. 709, 53 N. E. 1129.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Annotation—Division, in absence of special agreements, of water front, alluvion, and flats between adjoining riparian owners.

This note in supplementary to the note in Northern Pine-Land Co. v. Bigelow, 21 L.R.A. 776, supplemented by note to Stuart v. Greanyea, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, and contains only the cases decided later.

The question of title to islands is covered in note to Holman v. Hodges, 58 L.R.A. 673, supplemented by note to Wilson v. Watson, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 227.

The scope of this note is limited to cases in which both parties claim by reason of their being riparian owners. Cases in which one party claims the land as a special grant, or by prescriptive right, or by virtue of the peculiar wording of the deeds from a common grantor, do not fairly raise the question of division between riparian owners, and, of course, are not in point. CALKINS v. HART, ante, 783, is the only later case in which the question of division was squarely raised and decided. There are, however, a few later cases in which former holdings on the point have been approved, and a few that indicate the position of the court on very closely related questions.

In Rhodes v. Cissel (1907) 82 Ark. 367, 101 S. W. 758, it was held that the owners of land fronting upon a non-navigable lake, on the disappearance of the water, are entitled to take to its center; the extent of their respective interests depending upon the frontage. And this case was cited with approval and followed in Little v. Williams (1908) 88 Ark. 37, 113 S. W. 340, affirmed in (1913) 231 U. S. 335, 58 L. ed. 256, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 68. And the two cases were cited with approval and followed in Johnson v. Elder (1909) 92 Ark. 30, 121 S. W. 1066. The cases are again cited with approval in Barboro v. Boyle (1915) 119 Ark. 377, 178 S. W. 378, but not followed, for the reason that the lake was found to be navigable. In Elder v. Johnson (1915) 119 Ark. 403, 178 S. W. 396, which is a second appeal in the case of Johnson v. Elder, already cited, it was held that where land touches the non-navigable lake only at a given point, the owner could take no appreciable interest in the lake if it were divided among the riparian owners in accordance with the rules for the division thereof. It will be noted that, for the most part, these authorities are strongest on that part of the question L.R.A.1917B.

involving the right of the riparian owner to any land at all; and to that extent are not within the scope of this note. In the Rhodes Case, however, the question of division was involved to some extent, and the decision is based upon Scheifert v. Briegel (1903) 90 Minn. 125, 63 L.R.A. 296, 101 Am. St. Rep. 399, 96 N. W. 44, and Grand Rapids Ice & Coal Co. v. South Grand Rapids Ice & Coal Co. (1894) 102 Mich. 227, 25 L.R.A. 815, 47 Am. St. Rep. 516, 60 N. W. 681, both of which cases are directly in point, as explained in the note in 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 262.

In California there is a statute which provides, "except where the grant under which the land is held indicates a different intent, the owner of the upland, when it borders on tidewater, takes to ordinary high-water mark; when it borders upon a navigable lake or stream, where there is no tide, the owner takes to the edge of the lake or stream, at low-water mark; when it borders upon any other water, the owner takes to the middle of the lake or stream;" and the court in Foss v. Johnstone (1910) 158 Cal. 119, 110 Pac. 294, applied this statute as giving title to the adjacent landowner to the middle of a non-navigable lake; but the facts were such that it was unnecessary for the court to determine the division line between the proprietors of the upland. The case is, therefore, not strictly in point, and, notwithstanding the statute, the courts will yet be obliged to determine whether the division lines shall run at right angles with the middle line of the lake, or be simply extended to meet it.

One who owns a small portion of the bed of an inland lake, in connection with its bordering uplands, does not have the right to use the whole lake for fishing, boating, etc., in common with the other owners. Tripp v. Richter (1913) 158 App. Div. 136, 143 N. Y. Supp. 563. This, of course, merely indicates that the land is not owned in common by the riparian owners, and it indicates no rule for fixing the division line between owners.

And it has been held that owners of land fronting upon a lake that is meandered in the government survey, where they take the land to the center of the lake, take it in severalty. Brig- nall v. Hannah (1916) — N. D. —, 157 N. W. 1042. It will be seen that this is a question that is presupposed before the question of division can arise, and, of course, the note does not purport to be exhaustive of cases of this kind.

In Providence Forge Fishing & Hunting Club v. Miller Mfg. Co. (1915) 117 Va. 129, 83 S. E. 1047, the controversy seems to have been between the owners on opposite sides of an artificial pond. The trial court held that each took to the middle line of the pond; and, as the most of the current was on appellant's side, it was held that no error to his disadvantage had been permitted, and the decree was affirmed. Of course, the facts do not bring this case strictly within the scope of the note. J. W. M.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ROSE STEINBERG.

(— Ohio St. —, 113 N. E. 814.)

Carrier — conversion — remedy.

1. Where goods have been delivered to a common carrier for transportation, and the common carrier converts the property to its own use, the shipper may maintain an action for damages for breach of contract of carriage, or may sue for conversion.

For other cases, see Election of Remedies, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — conversion.

2. In a suit for conversion, where the facts do not authorize the assessment of exemplary damages, the general rule for the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion.

For other cases, see Damages, III. j., in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — articles for personal use.

3. This general rule is subject to the exception that, where the property converted by the defendant to its use consists of articles for personal use, which have been used by the owner, and therefore have little or no market value, the measure of damages is the reasonable value to the owner at the time of conversion.

For other cases, see Damages, III. j, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Carrier — rates.

4. Where a public utility has filed a schedule under the provisions of § 614-16, General Code, showing rates, joint rates, rentals, tolls, classification, and charges for services of each and every kind by it rendered or furnished, the rates, rentals, tolls, or charges named in the schedule become the legal rate for the services rendered, and must be charged by it and paid by the shipper or passenger without deviation therefrom.

For other cases, see Carriers, IV. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — sliding scale.

5. Where a sliding scale of charges, based upon the value of the articles transported, is provided in the schedule filed with the Public Utilities Commission of the state, it is the duty of the transporting company to require the shipper to declare the value, and to demand, collect, and receive from him the rate fixed in its schedule filed with the state Commission.

Headnotes by the COURT.

Note.—The refusal of a carrier to deliver goods as a conversion is considered in the note to O'Donnell v. Canadian P. R. Co. 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1172. For other phases of conversion by carrier, see Indexes to L.R.A. Notes, under the title "Carriers," subtitle "Conversion; refusal to deliver." Various questions in relation to measure of damages for breach of contract or tort by carrier, as well as for conversion generally, are treated in notes cited in the Indexes to L.R.A. Notes, under the title "Damages."

Although ERIE R. Co. v. STEINBERG, infra, involved an intrastate, and not an interstate, transportation, the court, as shown in the opinion, would have been strongly influenced by the construction placed by the United States Supreme Court upon the Carmack amendment as to the validity of stipulations limiting the amount of liability had it not been for the passage of the Cummins amendment, which was deemed, in a measure, at least, to have L.R.A.1917B.

obviated the effect of that interpretation. The effect of the Carmack amendment, prior to the Cummins amendment, upon state regulations as to stipulations limiting the liability of common carriers for loss or damage to goods, was treated in the notes to Bernard v. Adams Exp. Co. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 293; Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257; and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 819; and see also later cases, Boston & M. R. Co. v. Hooker, L.R.A.1915B, 450; Southern Exp. Co. v. Byers, L.R.A.1917A, 197; and Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Rankin, L.R.A.1917A, 265. Because of its probable bearing upon the practical effect of the Cummins amendment, attention is called to the questions considered in the notes to Harrington v. Wabash R. Co. 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 745, and Ellison v. Adams Exp. Co. L.R.A.1915A, 502, as to the effect of misrepresentation as to character, quality, or value of goods by shipper, on his right to recover for loss.

Same — notice to shippers.

6. For other cases, see Carriers, IV. o, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

Same — relief from liability.

7. A common carrier cannot relieve itself from the liability imposed by § 8994-1, General Code, by any rule or regulation contained in the schedule filed by it with the state Public Utilities Commission.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Mahoning County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged unlawful conversion of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Statement by the Court:

On the 20th day of October, 1913, the plaintiff below, Rose Steinberg, filed her petition in the common pleas court of Mahoning county, Ohio, against the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company and the Erie Railroad Company. In her amended petition she averred that on the 11th day of September, 1913, she took passage of Toledo, Ohio, on the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway for Youngstown, Ohio, and traveled over said railway to Cleveland, and was there transferred to a train of the Erie Railroad Company for Youngstown; that at Toledo she checked her trunk, containing certain goods described in the exhibit attached to her petition; that upon arriving at Youngstown plaintiff presented her check to the Erie Railroad Company and said defendant, "being in possession of said property, refused and failed to deliver the same, and unlawfully converted and disposed of said property to its own use."

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company filed a separate answer, admitting it is a common carrier doing business in the state of Ohio, and denying all the other allegations in the petition.

The Erie Railroad Company also filed its separate answer to the amended petition, in which it admitted that it is a common carrier.

of passengers and freight, and denied all the other allegations of the petition. Further answering, this defendant averred that, if any baggage was transported for plaintiff over its line of railway, the same was done under and by virtue of contract with the plaintiff; that, unless a greater value was declared by her, it was not to be liable in excess of $100 for any loss or destruction thereof. The answer also averred that said agreement was made in accordance with and under and by virtue of and arose from the local, interdivision, and joint tariff of baggage rules and regulations, excess baggage rates, and transfer charges in force and effect at the time complained of in said petition, schedules of which were properly filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and with the Public Utilities Commission of the state of Ohio; that the defendant was then engaged in interstate commerce; that the rules and regulations on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission and with the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio were applicable to the situation of the plaintiff; and that by reason thereof this defendant is in no event indebted to plaintiff in excess of $100 for the complete loss of any baggage shipped by her.

On the trial of the case it was admitted that the plaintiff had taken passage at Toledo, Ohio, as pleaded in her petition, and that the baggage reached the Erie Railroad Company's depot at Youngstown, Ohio, and some three days later, through error of the company's agents, was forwarded to New York, placed on a steamer, and taken to Europe.

Upon the admission of these facts the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company moved the court to dismiss the case as against it. That motion was sustained without objection on the part of the plaintiff or the defendant the Erie Railroad Company.

The Erie Railroad Company introduced in evidence, over the objection of the plaintiff, certified copies of the schedules filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and proof that the same were properly posted as required by law. At the close of the evidence, and before argument, the defendant requested the court to charge the jury that "the court says to you as a matter of law that in no event can the plaintiff recover more than the sum of $100 for loss of baggage."

This request was refused, and the court thereafter instructed the jury that the action was one for conversion, and that it might assume that the property described in the plaintiff's petition was converted by the railroad company to its own use, and further charged as follows: "By consent of counsel there is only one question to be submitted to this jury, and that is for you to determine what the fair market value, at the time of the conversion, was, of these goods. That is the only question that is submitted to you."

At the request of counsel for plaintiff, the court charged further reference to value as follows: "I say to you it isn't the fair market value, but it is a question of what the goods were reasonably worth to her at the time of the conversion."

Counsel for the defendant made no objection whatever to the statement of the court to the jury that, by consent of counsel, this one issue only was submitted to the jury, nor is it now claimed that this charge was not given by consent of counsel for all parties; the error complained of being the refusal of the court to charge as requested by plaintiff in error. A general exception, however, was taken to the charge as a whole.

The jury returned a verdict against the Erie Railroad Company in favor of the plaintiff for $285. A motion for new trial was overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict. Error was prosecuted to the court of appeals, which court affirmed the judgment of the common pleas court.

This proceeding in error is prosecuted in this court to reverse the judgment of the common pleas court and the judgment of the court of appeals, affirming the same.

Messrs. Hine, Kennedy, & Manchester, for plaintiff in error:

Rates, joint rates, charges for services of each and every kind rendered or furnished by a carrier, as well as all rules and regulations in any manner affecting the same, when filed and posted in accordance with the provisions of the acts regulating commerce, have the force of law, and therefore enter into and become a part of all contracts for transportation.
